A saranjamdar is not entitled to create in his own favour occupancy rights in lands unoccupied at the time the grant was made, or held by others then but forfeited on one ground or another during the subsistence of the grant. On resumption of a saranjam by the Government, such lands also become the property of the Government who become entitled to levy not merely the Government revenue assessed on such lands but actual rent. [p. 5, cols. 1 & 2.]

This principle applies not only to grants of the soil itself but also to grants of the land revenue only. [p. 4, col. 1.]

A party who accepts the onus on the issues as framed and allows the trial to proceed on that basis cannot be permitted at a subsequent stage of the case to contend that the onus was wrongly thrown upon him. [p. 3, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

Lord Sinha.—This is an appeal against a decree of the High Court of Bombay, dated August 15, 1924, which varied the decree of the District Court of Nasik, dated February 28, 1920, and made in Civil Suit No. 5 of 1914.

The suit arose under the following circumstances:—

Manmad village, now grown to an important Railway Junction, was held by the Vinchurkar—one of the lesser Mahratta chiefs—together with many other villages in "saranjam" grant from the Peishwa, the then ruler of the country. The last holder of the entire saranjam was the late Sardar Raghunathrao Vinchurkar, commonly known as Annasaheb, who held it from 1836 till 1889, when he died. On his deathbed he adopted as a son the plaintiff Shivdevrao, but the Government refused to recognise the adoption, and in 1892 re-granted half of the saranjam to the late Sardar's brothers and their sons and resumed the other half, which included Manmad village. The adopted son, though thus excluded from any share in the saranjam, would still be entitled to the private as opposed to the saranjam property of his adoptive father. Between 1892 and 1913 there were disputes between Government and Shivdevrao Vinchurkar as to certain lands in Manmad (the subject-matter of the present suit) which he claimed as his adoptive father's mirasi or private property by virtue of a sale-deed of 1755. These are five plots in the village site (described as A to E in the plaint) and six plots of agricultural lands within the village limits but not forming part of the village site, and described as Plots F to K in the plaint.

These disputes led to an order by the Commissioner of Revenue O. D. on April 9, 1913, whereby it was held that the lands in dispute were not covered by the sale-deed relied upon but "must have passed into the possession of the Vinchurkars by forfeiture of lands through the khatedar's (i. e., modern occupancy tenant) family being extinct or through default in the payment of land revenue." The Commissioner held that on the lapse of the saranjam to Government these lands also became the property of Government, who thereupon became entitled to levy not merely the Government revenue assessed thereupon, but the actual ground rent in respect of the plots included in the village sites, the tenants being liable to pay these rents to Government and not to the Vinchurkars; and, further, that in respect of the other plots, i. e., the agricultural lands, Government as owner was entitled to recover from the Vinchurkars not the assessed Government revenue, but the market rent, which was considerably larger, and in default of payment the Vinchurkars were ordered to be evicted.

This order of the Commissioner was in due course given effect to, and Shivdevrao Vinchurkar instituted the present suit for declaring the Commissioner's order illegal and for recovery of possession of the first five plots and an injunction against the threatened eviction in respect of the other six plots, and for mesne profits in respect of both.

In his plaint he based his title primarily on the sale-deed of 1755 above-mentioned, by which the then Patils of the village conveyed half of their rights to the ancestor of the Vinchurkar. He also relied on adverse possession "for over 150 years", and claimed that by virtue of certain admissions at different times on the part of various Government officials, Government was estopped from disputing the mirasi or private rights of the Vinchurkar family. But he alleged as an alternative basis of his title, and apparently in view of the Commissioner's finding, that "even if perchance the Court comes to the conclusion that the right of mirasi ownership... did not pass to the plaintiff's ancestors under the sale-deed of 1755 A. D., but that the property in suit must have gone into the possession of the plaintiff's ancestors by reason of the extinction of the khatedar's family or by reason of its resumption for arrears of assessment, still no manner of right whatever has accrued or accrues to the defendant in law over the said property. The said property is in law of the absolute personal and mirasi ownership and vahiwat of the plaintiff and his ancestors." (Para. 3 of plaint).

By his written statement the defendant denied all these allegations of fact and submissions of law by the plaintiff, and contended that the lands in suit were held by the plaintiff's ancestors as saranjam-dars and all saranjam rights, including the right to hold lands that had passed into his possession and enjoyment by the death of the khatedars without heirs or by forfeiture, had lapsed on the death of Annasaheb and had been resumed by Government (except as to one-half not now in question).

On the question of title by adverse possession and by estoppel, both the District Judge and the High Court held against the plaintiff, and their Lordships see no reason to differ from them.

Of the remaining issues the first was as follows:—Does the plaintiff prove that he (i. e., his ancestors) purchased the suit land by a sale-deed of 1755 A. D.?

The District Judge held that the construction of the deed in question presented some difficulty; for "it is in archaic language, and deals with a state of affairs to which no one now has the key," but on a review of the whole evidence, including village papers and accounts, he came to the conclusion that the lands sold by that deed did not include the lands in suit, and he found the first issue in the negative.

The High Court accepted this.

Notwithstanding this concurrent finding, some argument was addressed to their Lordships to prove that some, though not all, of the lands in suit are, in fact, covered by the sale-deed of 1755. After careful consideration, their Lordships see no reason to differ from the finding of both the Courts in India on this point.

Issue No. 2 was to the following effect:—

Does the plaintiff prove that his ancestors became owners of the suit lands either through forfeiture or through extinction of the khatedar's line?

The concurrent finding of both Courts on this issue appears to their Lordships to be that the lands in suit originally belonged to khatedars or mirasi tenants, and on their interests coming to an end in the manner mentioned the saranjamdar caused his own name to be put in their place in the *khata*s or village papers, and assumed possession of those lands.

The only other material issue remaining to be considered is Issue No. 6, viz.:—

Was the suit land included in the half of the saranjam resumed by the Government?

This is intended to raise the question whether as an effect of the resumption, the Government was entitled to oust plaintiff from the possession of those lands.

The answer depends on the legal effect of the finding on Issue No. 2.

Both the Courts below have answered it in the plaintiff's favour, the District Judge, on the ground that he was bound by the decision of the High Court reported as Gururao Shirinivas v. Secretary of State for India (1) (then under appeal to this Board and subsequently reversed), and the High Court on the ground that the judgment of this Board in Secretary of State for India v. Laxmi Bai (2), though it reversed the decision in Gururao Shirinivas v. Secretary of State for India (1), had not decided this particular point, with regard to which the High Court was of opinion that decisions of that Court had established the law in the manner contended for on behalf of the plaintiff. One of the learned Judges, Mr. Justice Fawcett, expressed his personal dissent from that view of the law, but considered himself bound by previous decisions of the High Court.

It is necessary, therefore, to consider what are the incidents of a saranjam grant, and how far the same can be gathered from Statutes or judicial decisions, in the absence of the deed of grant.

But, before doing so their Lordships think it necessary to deal with two points argued by Mr. DeGruyther on the respondent's behalf:—

1. That the onus of proof has been wrongly placed on the plaintiff, who, having been dispossessed, was entitled to succeed unless the Government affirmatively proved its own title to the lands in question.

The plaintiff accepted the onus on the issues as they were framed. Evidence was gone into on that basis, and the parties proceeded to trial evidently on the assumption that the plaintiff could derive title only in one or other of the ways mentioned in paras. 2 and 3 of the plaint. But for that, the procedure might have been different in many respects, and it appears to their Lordships too late to raise any such question at this stage.

Their Lordships would further observe that no basis of title other than those mentioned in paras. 2 and 3 of the plaint has up to the last been suggested on behalf of the plaintiff.

2. The second point was that the village papers, kept by the village officials, having entered the name of the Vinchurkar as khatedar in respect of the lands in suit, this must be taken to have been acquiesced in and accepted by the Collector on behalf of the Government, and it amounted in effect to a new agreement for a permanent tenancy, which remained unaffected by the subsequent resumption of the saranjam. This is a new case not suggested till the last moment, and even if their Lordships were inclined to entertain it (which they are not) it seems to have little foundation in fact. The position of the saranjamdar enabled him to have complete control over the management of the village and the village officials, and there is no reason to assume that these entries, or the papers themselves, were in any way brought to the cognizance of, or acquiesced in, and much less sanctioned by the Collector.

It is, no doubt, correct to say, as Mr. Justice Shah does, that "the fact that the saranjamdar is in a sense a life tenant does not alter the ordinary incidents of a grant by way of saranjam." But what those ordinary incidents are, must be ascertained, when there is no deed of grant forthcoming, from (a) the evidence, if any, in the case; (b) from legislative enactments; and (c) from judicial decisions. Failing all these, there would be nothing else but general principles of law to apply.

(2) 72 Ind. Cas. 898; 50 I. A. 49; 25 Bom. L. R. 527; 37 C. L. J. 461; 47 B. 327; A. I. R. 1923 P. O. 6; 17 L. W. 405; 44 M. L. J. 471; 32 M. L. T. 111; 28 C. W. N. 49 (P. C.).

Now we find from Wilson's Glossary that amongst the Mahrattas the term "saranjam" was applied specially to a temporary assignment of revenue from villages or lands for the support of troops or for personal military service, usually for the life of the grantee; also to grants made to persons appointed to civil offices of the State to enable them to maintain their dignity, and to grants for charitable purposes. These were neither transferable nor hereditary, and were held at the pleasure of the Sovereign. They were divided into two classes, viz., (a) grants of revenue only, i. e., of the royal share of the produce of the lands comprised in the grant, and (b) grants of the soil itself. It would seem to follow from the nature of saranjams that whether they were grants of the soil itself or of the revenue only of specified lands, they could not and were not meant to interfere with rights in those lands existing previously to and at the time of the grant. If and so far as there were occupancy tenants on those lands, they would retain their right of possession (whether it can be called ownership or not is immaterial) but subject to paying the assessed land revenue (i. e., the royal share of the produce) payable before the grant to the Government and after the grant to the grantee. On principle, the grantee would not, unless specially authorized, be able to convey a title larger than his own. He could not convey a permanent title to any portion of the land, either by sale or by lease. Such sale or lease might be good as against himself but would be void as against the grantor.

In the case of a grant of the soil itself, it has been decided by this Board that, on the grant coming to an end, the Government representing the original grantor is entitled to resume actual possession; Secretary of State for India v. Laxmi Bai (2). But it is urged that in the case of the other kind of grant, Government can take back only what it granted, viz., the royal share of the produce; in other words assess the land revenue payable in respect of the land, but it cannot interfere with the possession of the grantee. This would be quite consistent with principle, if the grant made the grantee a charge holder pure and simple. But if the grant also conveys by implication or otherwise the right to take possession of the land itself under certain circumstances, it is difficult to hold that though the charge might come to an end the possession taken under and by virtue of that charge should still continue, or, as Mr. Justice Fawcett put it, that the incident should survive the grant.

There is no legislative enactment which is applicable in the circumstances of this case. The Saranjam Rules of 1898 do not apply proprio vigore as this saranjam was resumed in 1897, and even if they can be held to be merely declaratory of the previous law, they do not throw any light on the question under consideration.

As regards judicial decisions, those with regard to inams do not seem to be necessarily applicable. The word inam is sometimes vaguely applied to all grants of revenue-free land, without reference to perpetuity or any specified conditions. But it would be unsafe to apply to a peculiar grant like the Mahratta Saranjam rules which were held applicable to grants in perpetuity.

Mr. Justice Shah refers to what he calls a "long course of decisions" in Bombay as establishing two propositions. The first is admittedly overruled by the decision of this Board in Secretary of State for India v. Laxmi Bai (2). His second is that in the case of a saranjam grant of the royal share of the revenue, it is open to the grantee to make the best use of the grant for his own benefit, i. e., to appropriate the lands to his own use, subject to the payment of the royal share of the revenue and to create rights of occupancy in his own favour or in favour of third parties.

On examination it appears that there are only three decisions which directly bear on the point, viz., Ramchandra Mantri v. Venkatrao (3), Ganpatrav Trimbak Patwardhan v. Ganesh Baji Bhat (4) and Hari Sadashiv v. Shaikh Ajmudin (5).

In the first of these cases Mr. Justice Melvill said at page 608* :—

"The saranjamdar may...deal with all unoccupied lands as may be best for the purposes of revenue, and may either cultivate them himself or through tenants."

And it was observed by Batchelor, J., in Balvant Ramchandra v. Secretary of State for India (6) that since Mr. Justice Melvill's judgment in 1882 the law in Bombay has

(3) 6 B. 598; 3 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 854.

(4) 10 B. 112; 5 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 460.

(5) 11 B. 235; 6 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 154.

(6) 32 B. 432; 10 Bom. L. R. 531.

always been that a grantee of the revenue is entitled to make such profit as he can out of the unoccupied lands.

But this is very far from holding that the right to make such profit survives the grant and continues after the grant has been resumed.

This construction was, however, placed on Mr. Justice Melvill's words quoted above in Ganpatrav Trimbak Patwardhan v. Ganesh Baji Bhat (4) where Sargent, C. J., after quoting the passage from Mr. Justice Melvill's judgment in Ramchandra Mantri v. Venkatrao (3) paraphrased it as follows (page 117*) :—"in other words, that the saranjamdar may acquire occupancy rights which...remain unaffected by the resumption of the saranjam, except as to the assessment thenceforth payable to Government."

These observations were not necessary for the decision of that case, and their Lordships are unable to agree that the language of Mr. Justice Melvill in Ramchandra Mantri v. Venkatrao (3) bears the meaning or has the effect attributed to it by Sargent, C. J.

The same observations would apply to the case of Hari Sadashiv v. Shaikh Ajmudin (5). The Government was not a party to either of these cases, and the lands in dispute were held on the evidence in both cases to be the private property (sheri lands in the one case and mirasi lands in the other) of the grantee. Their Lordships are, therefore, unable to hold that there is any long course of decisions in the High Court of Bombay laying down with regard to saranjams of this nature the broad rule enunciated by Mr. Justice Shah—that the grantee would be entitled to create in his own favour occupancy rights in lands unoccupied at the time the grant was made or held by others then but forfeited on one ground or another during the subsistence of the grant.

The question whether he could create such rights in favour of third persons by virtue of the powers of management above referred to does not arise in this case, and their Lordships refrain from expressing any opinion upon the point. But their Lordships hold that he could not create such rights in his own favour, and that when the saranjam was resumed, the Government became entitled to resume not only the land revenue, but also all the rights and benefits that the grantee had secured by virtue of his grant.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be decreed with costs and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs in both the Courts in India.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), Sch. II, Arts. 8, 13—Suit by shrotriendmar to collect rent and swatantram from tenant, whether of Small Cause nature.

The words 'by reason of his interest' in Art. 13 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act confine the cesses or other dues contemplated by the Article to payments to be made to a person claiming to be entitled to them by reason of his interest in the immoveable property, and operate to exclude payments which a landholder receives not for his personal benefit but for some public or communal purpose. [p. 6, col. 2.]

A suit for swatantram which a shrotriendmar collects from his tenants towards the cost of the village agency does not come within Art. 13 and is not excluded from the jurisdiction of a Small Cause Court. [p. 6, cols. 1 & 2.]

No. 179 of 1922, preferred against that of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Chingleput, in O. S. No. 936 of 1919.

Mr. A. V. Viswanatha Sastri, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This Letters Patent Appeal is from the judgment of Spencer, J., in S. A. No. 1518 of 1923, dismissing the second appeal on the ground that under s. 102, Civil Procedure Code, no such appeal lay, "inasmuch as the suit was of a nature cognizable by a Court of Small Causes and the value of the subject-matter did not exceed Rs. 500. The suit which was valued at Rs. 354 was brought by a shrotriendrar to recover melvaram and swatantrams from his tenant. Melvaram, it is not disputed, is rent, and under Art. 8 of the Second Schedule of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, a suit for rent is cognizable by a Court of Small Causes which has been expressly invested with the power to try such a suit. All Subordinate Judges and District Munsifs within the Madras Presidency have been invested with powers to try rent suits upon the Small Cause side, provided that they fall within the pecuniary limits of their Small Cause Jurisdiction, so that the effect of this Article read with the empowering notification, is to exclude all such rent suits from the Second Schedule and to make them cognizable by a Small Cause Court. In other words, the effect of the notification is to delete Art. 8 from the Schedule, and it only remains to inquire, therefore, whether, by reason of the circumstance that the claim to swatantrams can be brought under any other Article of the Schedule the suit for melvaram and swatantrams was of a nature not cognizable by a Small Cause Court.

The only Article which requires consideration is No. 13 which excludes "a suit to enforce payment of the allowance or fees respectively called malikana and hagq or of cesses or other dues when the cesses or dues are payable to a person by reason of his interest in immoveable property or in an hereditary office or in a shrine or other religious institution." It has been suggested to us that a swatantram is a cess payable to a person by reason of his interest in immoveable property, namely, to the shrotriendrar whose interest in the land in respect of which this cess is payable is that of landlord. It is not disputed that a swatantram is a contribution, collected in this instance at least by the landlord, towards the cost of the village agency. If any authority be required for this view of the nature of the payment, it is to be found in Vadamalai Thiruvannatha Savuga Pandia Thevar v. Sankara Moorthi Naidu (1), but the point is conceded. It is for consideration, therefore, whether a cess which the landowner collects, but collects for disbursement of the proceeds to the village servants, and not for his own benefit, can be deemed to be payable to him "by reason of his interest in immoveable property."

The case of Maharajah of Vizianagaram v. Kota Veeranna (2) which is the only case cited to us under this Article, related to the recovery of land-cess from an inamdar by a zemindar, and although that is not a parallel case, we may quote with approval the opinion, which the judgment contains, that "the cesses and dues contemplated in Art. 13 are payments which a person is entitled to as representing his interest in certain immoveable property, and not because he possesses some interest in immoveable property."

We think it is clear that the words "by reason of his interest" confine the cesses or other dues contemplated by the Article to payments to be made to a person claiming to be entitled to them by reason of his interest in the immoveable property, and that they operate to exclude payments which a landholder receives not for his personal benefit but for some public or communal purpose. Although, no doubt, it is customary and convenient that the landowner should collect the swatantrams yet he only does so as the administrator of a fund created for a special purpose, and it would be possible to make arrangements for collecting the money without his instrumentality. We think that the Article relates only to payments of money due to a person in consideration of his interest in the property, and that accordingly swatantrams do not fall within its scope.

We agree, therefore, with the learned Judge that the suit was of a nature cognizable by a Small Cause Court and that no second appeal lay. The Letters Patent Appeal is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 16—Suit for mesne profits of immoveable property situate outside British India, whether triable in British India—Tests.

Though the Civil Procedure Code does not forbid the institution of a suit in British India even if it involves an adjudication regarding plaintiff's title to immoveable property outside British India, yet under general principles of law Courts in British India should refuse to entertain suits in which an estate in land in a foreign country or a right annexed to such an estate is claimed. [p. 7, col. 2; p. 8, col. 1.]

This principle does not apply to suits for mesne profits where no question of title is involved and the decree can effectually be enforced by the personal obedience of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the trial Court. [p. 8, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff-appellant sued the defendant for the recovery of mesne profits in respect of certain immoveable property in Gwalior State. He stated that his right to the property had been decided by a judgment of that State and that the defendant resided within the jurisdiction of the Khamgaon Court.

The main defence was that an appeal was pending against the Gwalior decision, so that under the explanation to s. 10, Civil Procedure Code, the Courts in British India would still have to decide the question of the plaintiff's title to the property. The learned Judge held that, as it would be necessary to go into the question of the plaintiff's title to lands situate outside British India, he had no jurisdiction to try the case and returned the plaint for presentation to the proper Court.

The plaintiff has appealed against this order. The respondent admits that the plaintiff's title to the property has been finally upheld by the Gwalior Court, and does not contend that the order was correct because the state of affairs was different when it was passed. It is then not disputed that the suit should have been kept pending till the final decision of the title suit in Gwalior, if that final decision gives the plaintiff a right to sue in the British Courts.

Section 20 of the Civil Procedure Code permits, subject to the limitations contained in the preceding sections, a plaintiff to sue in a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the defendant actually and voluntarily resides. Section 16 has no application to this case, for the explanation states that in this section 'property' means 'property situate in British India'. The Civil Procedure Code then does not forbid the institution of the suit such as the present even if the decision in the suit involves adjudication regarding the plaintiff's title to immoveable property outside British India.

There is, however, a general principle which prevents the trial of a suit involving such adjudication. In Goculdas v. Chaganlal (1), Page, J., was considering the interpretation of a clause of the Letters Patent (1865), but passages cited by him show that Indian Courts are, apart from specific provisions limiting their jurisdiction, under the necessity of avoiding the insuperable difficulties which would result from an attempt to found a jurisdiction over immoveable property situate in another country.

The following passages show the nature of the principle:—

"(Foote's Private International Law, page 223) 'The defendant's Judge' wrote Vattel—'is the Judge of the place where the defendant has his settled abode or the Judge of the place where the defendant is when any sudden difficulty arises, provided it does not relate to an estate in land, or to a right annexed to such an estate. In such a case, as property of this kind is to be held according to the laws of the country where it is situated, and as the right of granting it is vested in the ruler of the country, controversies relating to such property can only be decided in the State in which it depends.'

"(B. 2, Ch. 8, s. 103).

"Story lays down that—

'in respect to immoveable property, every attempt of any foreign tribunal to found a jurisdiction over it must, from the very nature of the case, be utterly nugatory, and its decree must be for ever incapable of execution in rem. We have seen, indeed, that by the Roman Law a suit might in many cases be brought either where the property was situate or where the party had his domicile. This might well be done within any of the vast domains over which the Roman Empire extended; for the judgments of its tribunals would be everywhere respected and obeyed. But among the independent nations of modern times there would be insuperable difficulties in such a course. And hence even in countries acknowledging the Roman Law it has become a very general principle that suits in rem should be brought where the property is situate: and this principle is applied with almost universal approbation in regard to immoveable property. The same rule is applied to mixed actions, and to all suits which touch the reality."

Following this principle District Courts in British India must refuse to entertain suits in which an estate in land in a foreign country, or a right annexed to such an estate is claimed.

But every suit for mesne profits is not affected by this principle. While Courts of Equity have never claimed to act directly upon land situate abroad they have purported to act upon the conscience of persons living here [Per Lord Herschell in British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Mocambique (2) quoted at page 662* in Goculdas v. Chaganlal (1)]. The general rule is that the Court will not adjudicate on questions relating to the title to, or the right to the possession of, immoveable property out of the jurisdiction: [Deschamps v. Miller (3) quoted at page 661* in Goculdas v. Chaganlal (1)]. But if no question of title is involved and the decree can effectively be enforced by the personal obedience of the defendant within the jurisdiction, a claim for mesne profits may be entertained and a decree may be passed on such a claim.

The lower Court was then correct in entertaining the plaintiff's case as the plaintiff stated that there was no subsisting dispute regarding title of land in the Gwalior State, and was right in thinking that when the defendant showed there was an existing dispute, it was necessary either to stay the suit or to put an end to the proceedings. But I accept the contention that the suit should have been stayed. There is now no subsisting dispute regarding title to the land, and it is not contended that there is any other obstacle to the trial of the claim for mesne profits by the lower Court.

The order of the lower Appellate Court is, therefore, set aside and the learned Judge is directed to proceed with the trial. Costs in this Court will, in the circumstances, be borne as incurred. Pleader's fee: Rs. 75.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 116—Under-proprietor in possession of land—Execution of kabuliyat—Estoppel—Agreement to take theka, whether destroys rights in sir lands.

Section 116 of the Evidence Act is designed to meet the case of a tenant who has been put in possession by his landlord and is not applicable where the tenant has not been so put into possession. [p. 9, col. 2.]

The execution of a kabuliyat by a person who is already in possession as an under-proprietor does not, therefore, estop him from setting up his under-proprietary rights. [ibid.]

An under-proprietor does not lose his rights as such in the sir plots by obtaining a theka of the whole village from the taluqdar until the end of the settlement. [p. 9, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Rae Bareilly, dated the 20th January, 1927, upholding that of the Additional Sub-Judge, Rae Bareilly, dated the 28th January, 1925.

Mr. Radha Krishna, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mahabir Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises from a suit brought by a taluqdar for a declaration that the defendants are not under-proprietors in certain specific plots in the village of Asapur in the Rae Bareilly District. It appears that the ancestors of the defendants were at one time proprietors in the village. We do not know when they ceased to be proprietors, but we do know that in the year 1861 they were able to show that they were sir holders in these plots, and the Court decided that the taluqdar could not enhance their rents. We also know that in the year 1868 they applied to be given a sub-settlement, but a compromise was entered into in that year, which was incorporated in a decree, by which they were given a theka, or lease of the whole village until the end of the settlement but without rights of transfer. In the year 1899 the taluqdar ejected them by suit from the theka but they retained possession of the sir land as is shown by a report made by the Qanungo in March 1901. In August of that year certain members of the family executed a kabuliyat which is a bare agreement to pay rent on these plots, for a period of years, written on a printed form. This kabuliyat was succeeded by another kabuliyat, but no kabuliyat exists after the year 1917. In the year 1918 the taluqdar issued a notice of ejectment on the defendants, and in reply the latter filed a suit claiming under-proprietary title in these plots. The Revenue Court decided in favour of the defendants, and that decision has become final. This suit was filed in the Civil Court in the year 1923 and both the Subordinate Judge and the lower Appellate Court have held that the defendants are under-proprietors. The taluqdar has come to this Court in second appeal and pleads that the under-proprietary title of the defendants has never been established. Now there is a clear finding of fact in both the Courts below that the defendants were under-proprietors in the year 1861 and in the year 1868 when they brought their claim for a sub-settlement. We are not prepared to go behind that finding in second appeal, but we have assured ourselves that the finding is based upon admissible and prima facie sufficient evidence. It is, however, argued that, even if the under-proprietary title existed in 1868, it was brought to an end by the execution of the compromise filed in Court. The effect of that compromise was, as we have stated above, to give the defendants a theka of the whole village until the end of the settlement. We see no reason why an under-proprietor should not enter into an agreement of this sort with the taluqdar without in any way damaging his own rights as under-proprietor in the sir plots. When the theka came to an end by the ejectment of the defendants they were, as has been pointed out by the Courts below, ejected only from their rights as thekadar but retained possession of the sir plots, and this possession has continued till the present day. Thus, in our opinion, the compromise of 1868 had no effect upon the defendants' rights to be regarded as under-proprietors in the specific plots.

There remains the question of the effect of the kabuliyats entered into by some members of the family. Upon this point there is a concurrent finding of fact by the Courts below that these kabuliyats were entered into by certain members of the defendants' family on account of a misapprehension or mistake as to their legal position, but whether this be so or not it is only by estoppel, as laid down in s 116 of the Evidence Act, that the defendants' title as under-proprietors could be affected by the execution of these kabuliyats. Section 116 is designed to meet the case of a tenant who has been put in possession by his landlord and it was based on the provisions of English Law which enacted that a tenant who has been so let into possession could not deny his landlord's title. This has been held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bilas Kunwar v. Desraj Ranjit Singh (1). In the present case the defendants were not put into possession by these kabuliyats or by any lease executed by the landlord. They remained in possession of their own sir plots, and the execution of these kabuliyats had no effect upon their possession or upon their title. Moreover, it is not the case that the landlord's title was impugned during the tenancy. It was not impugned until the suit was brought, by the defendants two years after the last kabuliyat had expired. Thus on this point also we are prepared to agree with the view of the Court below, and to find that the under-proprietary title of the defendants has been established and has never been lost.

The Court of first instance held that the Civil Court had jurisdiction in this matter and it does not appear that this question was argued in the lower Appellate Court. In view of our findings above, we do not think it incumbent upon us to enter into a discussion on this question. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 1782 OF 1922.

PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 39, 94, 107—Sale of goods—Notice of arrival—Separate notices as to arrival of portions, validity of—Refusal to perform—Right to retract refusal before due date—Place of delivery—Buyer's duty to take delivery at seller's place of business—Re-sale—Reasonable time—Question of fact—New plea in appeal, whether allowable—Continuing sale for successive days without fresh notice, legality of—Sale by shipments—Tender of goods of different shipment, legality of—Waiver of condition, what amounts to.

Where a contract for sale of goods contemplates the arrival of the goods piece-meal or in one lot as the shippers or the other carriers may be able to deal with them, the fact that the goods contracted for arrived on two different days and the seller gave notice to the buyer of the separate arrivals without waiting for the arrival of the whole of the goods, does not constitute a breach of the condition regarding notice of the arrival of goods, provided the buyer has received notice of the arrival of all the goods contracted for. [p. 12, col. 1.]

A party to a contract who has refused to perform his part of the contract, is not precluded from retracting his refusal before the due date expires and giving notice of his readiness and willingness to perform. [p. 12, col. 2.]

Section 39 of the Contract Act applies to all breaches of contract which occur before the expiry of the last date on which the contract can be performed in whole or in part though it also covers and includes all earlier breaches. [ibid.]

In view of s. 94 of the Contract Act a seller is not bound to offer delivery of the goods at the buyer's place of business, but it is the duty of the buyer to take delivery at the seller's place of business. [p. 13, col. 1.]

The fact that a re-sale advertised for a particular day was continued on subsequent days without fresh notice of proclamation in the hope of getting better price, does not vitiate the re-sale. [ibid.]

The question of reasonable time is one of fact and a buyer cannot be allowed to set up, for the first time in appeal, the plea that a re-sale was not conducted within a reasonable time. [ibid.]

A seller who has agreed to sell goods of a shipment of a particular month is not entitled to make a valid tender of goods of the same description of a different shipment. [p. 14, col. 1.]

The mere fact that a bill of lading showed that the goods tendered by the seller were those of a different shipment, and the buyer took no exception to this irregularity though he objected to shortage, does not amount to waiver of this irregularity. [ibid.]

Nannier v. Rayulu Iyer (1) and Gulab Rai-Sagar Mal v. Nirbhe Ram-Nagar Mal (2), distinguished.

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Delhi, dated the 26th June, 1922.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, Messrs. M. L. Puri and Hem Raj, for the Appellants.

Lala Sardha Ram, R. S., Messrs. G. S. Salariya and Bishen Narain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The firm of Jugal Kishore-Gulab Singh sued the firm of Phul Chand-Fateh Chand for a sum of Rs. 18,533 being the difference between the price actually realised for 25 bales of piece-goods when sold in February, 1919, and June, 1919, and the contract price. The goods in question were to have been of three shipments, May, June and July; 9 bales of May, 8 of June and 8 of July, and the plaintiff succeeded in proving his case so far as the May and June shipments were concerned, but failed as regards July, it being found that there was a fatal defect in his case so far as this shipment was concerned, in that instead of his having offered 8 bales of July shipment he offered 6 of July and 2 of August. A decree was, therefore, given for Rs. 11,651-10. Against this the defendant firm appeals and the plaintiff firm presents cross-objections regarding the balance of their claim.

The facts of the case are simple enough. The contract is clear. The defendant was bound to take delivery and make payment as soon as he was informed of the arrival of the goods and the plaintiff, on the other hand, was under the contemporaneous obligation of accepting the money and delivering the goods. On the 25th and 27th of September, the plaintiff advised the defendant that the goods of the May shipment had arrived in Delhi. On the 30th of September, 1918, the plaintiff wrote again calling upon the defendant to take up the goods against payment within ten days and stating that if he failed to do so, he would dispose of the goods. In answer to this the defendant wrote a letter on the 1st October, 1918, alleging that he had sent his man several times to ask for delivery of the goods but without success and that "at last they had advised their bankers, Messrs. King, King and Co., to take delivery of the 9 bales of muslin on payment to you of the price thereof in full settlement. Therefore (the letter continues), please receive your money in full on account of the 9 bales of muslin from Messrs. King, King and Co., and deliver the goods and the papers relating to costs to them within three days. If you fail to do so, you shall be liable for any loss that will be suffered by us as also by our customers. Please note this." In answer to this a letter was written on the 3rd of October, 1918, in the following terms:—"In reply to your notice, dated 1st instant, regarding 9 packages of mulls, we have to inform you that until you give us the delivery of the above goods (i. e., two bales described in the heading) your notice cannot be accepted in any case; please note."

In the interval a letter dated 2nd October, 1918, was written by Messrs. King, King and Co., to the plaintiff which ran as follows: "We have received instructions from Messrs. Phul Chand-Fateh Chand to pay for the above draft plus Rs. 2,475 as profit at Rs. 1-6 per piece. Kindly send us the goods and memo. and receive the money." No money was sent. To this the plaintiff did not reply and on the 10th of October, he wrote again to the defendant calling upon him to take delivery:—

"We are ever ready to deliver the goods. Messrs. King, King and Co. sent us a letter only but not the money, hence please either send the money yourself or King, King and Co., and take the goods.

"Regarding original invoice please note you can see same at our shop."

The goods were sold in February and the question to be decided is whether the plaintiff was justified in acting as he did.

It is urged on appeal by Mr. Tek Chand that the contract was broken by the plaintiff, and that the defendant was in no way bound to do his part after receipt of the letter dated the 3rd of October, 1918. He contends that s. 39 of the Indian Contract Act does not apply to the case, and that it is sufficient for him to show that the plaintiff was not willing and ready on one particular occasion to deliver the goods and, if this is established, his obligations ceased. He also takes exception to the invoices sent to him by the plaintiff, in that they referred to the consignment in two lots. He states that because a contract must be performed in its entirety, a man who has undertaken to deliver 9 bales of a certain shipment is bound to give notice of the arrival of the total number of bales which constitute the shipment at one time and that if he writes, as the plaintiff did in this case, to intimate the separate arrivals of the two portions which made up the whole he has committed a breach which entitles the buyer to disclaim all sort of liability under the contract and that he can take the objection for the first time five years after the due date. Further he contends that if the plaintiff was justified in re-selling the goods, the sale was belated, that the plaintiff has wholly failed to show that it was conducted within reasonable time and that, therefore, at the worst, he, the buyer, can only be liable to pay damages. Such is the case regarding the May shipment.

As regards the June shipment the same points are urged with this exception that Messrs. King, King and Co., do not come into the correspondence and that on receiving a notice, dated the 2nd of December, from the plaintiff the defendant wrote as follows on the 7th of December: "We came to know that these goods have arrived since long and you give its arrival information now, hence we are not responsible for these goods owing to your negligence, which please note." To this the plaintiff replied that, as a matter of fact, they had made a mistake and the goods had not arrived at all. On the 11th of February he wrote saying that they had come and the defendants must take delivery, to which the defendants replied on the 11th of March to the effect that the arrival notice was not given at a proper time and for this and other reasons they were not responsible. These goods were auctioned in the month of June.

We take first the question of whether the notice given by the plaintiff was sufficient and legal. The terms of the contract which are at page 59 of the printed paper-book contain the following sentence: "We shall receive invoice and pattern and take delivery of the goods as soon as we are informed of their arrival." Counsel relies on an unprinted ruling of this Court, being No. 2684 of 1922, which he says is precisely the converse case. The facts are, in our opinion, quite different, for there it was a question of the goods having arrived in one shipment, the contract having been.

for two, and naturally it was held that the buyer was not liable and that he was entitled to receive goods in accordance with the terms of his contract. In our opinion the actual wording of this contract contemplates the arrival of the goods piece-meal or in one lot just as the shippers and the Railway Company might be able to deal with them, and the fact that there was a two days' interval and that the plaintiff informed his buyer as soon as these consignments arrived did not, in our opinion, constitute any sort of breach of the conditions inasmuch as he did receive the notice of the arrival of the whole of the consignment, which was of the correct shipment.

It is contended that, however long the interval, the seller should have waited until all the goods had arrived rendering his buyer liable for godown rent in the interval in accordance with the terms of the contract and should have intimated the arrival of the goods as soon as they were complete and not before. There is, in our opinion, no force in this contention though the buyer would doubtless have been entitled to hold his hand and take no action until and unless the whole of the consignment had arrived and he was told of its arrival: provided always the goods were actually shipped in May, it is wholly immaterial whether they were on board one, two or nine ships and came up from Bombay in one or several trains.

The second and the most important point is whether the plaintiff was or was not ready and willing to perform the contract; in other words, had he control over the necessary goods and was he prepared to give delivery on the buyer performing his part of the contract. There was previously litigation between the seller and his own seller, and it is quite clear and is not disputed that the goods were in existence and lying in the custody of the Bank to be delivered on payment being tendered. That being so, it is clear that the plaintiff was ready and willing unless it be held that his letter of the 3rd of October in some way debarred him from exercising his control over the goods. The first thing to be seen is what was the due date. The plaintiff himself had called upon the defendant to take delivery before the 10th of October. The defendant wrote saying that he had deposited the necessary money with Messrs. King, King and Co. The plaintiff refused to give delivery except on certain conditions but subsequently on the 10th October resiled from this position and called upon the buyer to perform. It is contended by Mr. Tek Chand that once the plaintiff had written this conditional refusal he had debarred himself for all time from performing or demanding performance of the contract. He does not rely upon s. 39 of the Contract Act and contends that the contract had actually come to an end, and there could be no question of delivery at any later date. In our opinion this is a wholly impossible position, and even though the plaintiff was not willing on that particular date—the 3rd of October—to give delivery except on conditions, which he was not justified in making, the due date had not expired and he was quite within his rights in demanding performance within a reasonable time. Even if the most extreme view be taken of this letter of the 3rd October, and it be treated as an absolute refusal, the position would, in our opinion, be governed by the terms of s. 39. There is much misunderstanding and much loose argument based on the unfortunate fact that the word “anticipatory” has somehow been associated with the section, and it is often said that the section only refers to anticipatory breaches in the sense of breaches which occur before due date. The word “anticipatory” nowhere occurs in the section and the very wording of the section and the illustration thereunder make it clear that it applies to all such breaches which occur before the expiry of the last date on which the contract can be performed in whole or in part though it also covers and includes all earlier breaches. The defendant admittedly took no action on receipt of the letter of the 3rd of October. It was, therefore, open to the plaintiff to change his mind and to offer to deliver the goods unconditionally before the expiry of the due date, and this he did.

Further before the defendant can challenge the conduct of the plaintiff it is for him to show that he performed his part of the contract and made a proper and sufficient demand accompanied by the necessary sum of money, for the facts of this case show that the goods were lying in the custody of the Alliance Bank and could not be withdrawn until a certain draft was cleared by payment of money. It was, therefore, absolutely essential that money should accompany the demand. It was also necessary under s. 94 of the Contract Act that the buyer should ask to have the goods made over to him at the seller's place of business and not at his own. There were, therefore, two fatal defects in the so-called demand, for Messrs. King, King and Co. asked to have the goods sent and further to have them sent without any money being paid.

This brings us to the question of whether the re-sale was defective. It is contended by Mr. Tek Chand that it never took place, that there was no real sale in the sense that there was no real purchaser, that there was a fatal flaw in the proceedings in that the sale having been advertised for one day was twice continued on subsequent days without notice or proclamation and finally that the sale was wholly bad as being belated.

In the pleas the sale was objected to as "fictitious, unwarranted and illegal." There is no definite plea that it took place after the expiry of reasonable time. Mr. Tek Chand contends that the word "illegal" covers all possible defects, and that the burden lay heavily upon the plaintiff to prove that all the conditions precedent as required by s. 107 of the Indian Contract Act were fulfilled. On the other hand, it is urged, and we think with greater force, that it is wholly impossible for any man to meet a plea of this sort until it is made, that the question of reasonable time is one of fact depending upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, that had the plea been taken the plaintiff would have had to produce such evidence as would have satisfied the Court that the delay was not unreasonable and that the failure to take the plea is fatal to the defendant's case. The objection to the re-sale on the ground of its being fictitious appears to us to be entirely frivolous. Witnesses were produced with their books to show that they purchased some of the bales and objections were taken to them seriatim according to their position in life. The partners in the firm were objected to as not being munims and the munims as not being partners, and it was pointed out that both were unable from their own knowledge to prove both the sale and the entries in support of it. The objection regarding the adjournment is also, in our opinion, quite immaterial, for the buyer could in no way be injured by such adjournment. The auction took place on the advertised date, and in the hope of getting a better price the auctioneer went on and did more work than he need have done. The bids on the later days were precisely the same and a higher price could not be realised.

Regarding the June shipment there is no point which is not common to the May shipment except that of the date of the bill of lading. This was raised in this Court by Mr. Tek Chand, but Counsel for the plaintiff was able to dispose of it by showing us on the record a copy of one of the original portions of the bill of lading which is made out in triplicate (Ex. P-39). The same objections were taken regarding the re-sale and Counsel further contended that the great delay in the arrival of this shipment proves that it cannot have been a June shipment at all. This objection, in our opinion, is disposed of by the bill of lading itself, and it is noticeable that this objection was not taken at any stage of the case until today.

The cross objections of the plaintiff deal with the July shipment, the claim regarding which has been disallowed because instead of tendering 8 bales of this shipment the plaintiff tendered 6 of the July shipment together with two of August. The Subordinate Judge has held that this is a fatal flaw and has dismissed his case so far as it relates to this shipment. The invoices are to be found at pages 41 and 42, the first describing the six bales of the July shipment and the latter the two bales of the August. To this invoice the defendant objected in a letter of the 9th October 1918, in which he took exception to the fact that there was a difference in pieces according to the contract terms meaning that the last bale No. 25 of the August shipment was 37 pieces short. To this the plaintiff replied on 14th October, 1918:—"In reply to yours, dated the 9th instant we have to bring to your notice that no number of pieces are entered in the contract and besides this there are 8 cases in our one shipment of 18-25 and the total number of pieces in the above 8 cases are correct." This letter was apparently based on a note Ex. P-75 made on the letter to which it was a reply:—"No detail of pieces, etc., is given in our contract. One chalan comprises 8 cases Nos. 18 to 25. Please check and examine the pieces contained in all the 8 cases. They are all right". Counsel now contends that as the bill of lading, which was quoted in the second notice showed that the shipment was of August and the buyer took no exception to this irregularity, he must be taken to have waived his right to object and this more especially as he did take exception to the shortage. He relies on Nannier v. Rayulu Iyer (1) and Gulab Rai-Sagar Mal v. Nirbhe Ram-Nagar Mal (2), but the correspondence read as a whole does not, in our opinion, support the plaintiff's contention. In his later letter he spoke himself of one shipment, when admittedly there were two of different months, and now interprets this as meaning "the two shipments which were converted into one by your kindly overlooking the irregularity, regarding the second shipment." This is quite impossible, and we think it clear that the buyer who wished to get out of the bargain overlooked the date which does appear on the invoice but not against any words indicating that it is the date of the bill of lading though doubtless in commercial circles this is understood. The point which he did notice and apparently thought was a good ground for putting an end to the transaction was that of shortage, and, in our opinion, the facts are not sufficiently similar to those contained in the two rulings to make them applicable, and while reading Nannier v. Rayulu Iyer (1) it is necessary to bear in mind that it is in continuation of and does not dissent in any way from Parthasarathy Chetty v. Gajapathy Naidu & Co. (3). Further, even if it were possible to hold that there had been a complete waiver it would still be for the plaintiff to show that the goods sold by him at the time of the re-sale were the actual goods, by tendering which he performed his contract. No tender of August goods was sufficient and valid, and there is no getting away from the fact that the goods sold were not in their entirety those contracted for, and, therefore, in a suit of this nature it is wholly impossible for the plaintiff to succeed.

The result, therefore, is that both the appeal and the cross-objections must be dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.—In the present mortgage suit, the facts of which are sufficiently clear from the lower Court's judgment, the present appellant, who was defendant No. 4 in the lower Court, was impleaded in view of the fact that he had obtained a perpetual lease of khudkasht field No. 47 of Mouza Jolwadi from the first three and seventh defendants. The connected 2-anna 8-pie share of Mouza Jolwadi has been released under the decree passed by the lower Court on the ground that at the time the mortgage came into being, the said share was under the management of the Collector. The Subordinate Judge, First Class, for reasons which are sufficiently clear from his judgment, has, however, held that the khudkasht field No. 47, which was the subject of the present appellant's lease, was liable under the mortgage and it has accordingly been included in the mortgage-decree. I, am, therefore, solely concerned in this appeal with the question as to whether the inclusion of this field is correct or not.

In this connection, I have been referred by the Pleader for the appellant to para. 6 of the plaintiffs' written statement dated 10th July, 1925. It has been suggested that therein the plaintiffs rested their case on the fact that the 2-anna 8-pie share of Mouza Jolwadi mortgaged was not the same 2-anna 8-pie share as was under the control of the Collector at the time being. It is perfectly clear that the plaintiffs' first plea in this connection was that the mortgagors had a 5 anna 4-pie share in each of the two villages Jolwadi and Bhojgadh and that it was the 2-anna 8-pie share which was unaffected by the Collector's control and which was mortgaged. The lower Court, in its finding on issue No. 8 has, however, found this point against the plaintiffs and there has clearly been no proof that the mortgagors had more than 2-anna 8-pie share in Mouza Jolwadi.

It has now been suggested on behalf of the present defendant-appellant, apparently for the first time, that the khudkasht fields Nos. 47, 17 and 9 with a total acreage of 9.14 acres must be the same as the khudkasht fields Nos. 10 and 52 with a total acreage of 9.15 acres, which the lower Court holds were under the management of the Collector along with a 2-anna 8-pie share of Mouza Jolwadi. I do not think, however, this contention can possibly be now accepted, offered as it is for the first time in the Appellate Court. If we turn to para. 6 of the plaintiffs' written statement, it is perfectly clear that there the latter offered an alternative plea. Even supposing that the contention the mortgagors owned a 5 anna 4-pie share in the village and that it was the free portion of that share which was mortgaged failed, the plaintiffs clearly offered a further distinct plea that anyhow the rest of the property covered by the mortgage was not included in the Collector's proceedings and that the mortgage would hold good as regards such further property. Now, if the present defendant-appellant's case had been that numbers 10 and 52, in reality, referred to the same lands as the numbers 47, 17 and 9, I should certainly have expected to find a specific plea from him to this effect in his written statement, dated 24th September, 1925. The said written statement is, however, absolutely silent on the point and he therein rested his case on the fact that the lease of field No. 47 had been given to him in the ordinary course of management and that, in any event, the mortgage having been executed when the Collector's proceedings were pending, the whole of it was void irrespective of the fact whether the subjects covered by the mortgage were all at the time in the hands of the Collector. On this latter point, I see no reason to differ from the decision of Kotval, A. J. C., in Gangaram v. Ram Gopal (1); the incompetency of the mortgage only extended to the property of which the Collector had expressly assumed management.

It has next been urged in this connection on behalf of the appellant that whatever interest he had in the 2-anna 8-pie share, necessarily must be considered as having been under the management of the Collector and that, therefore, khudkasht field No. 47 came within the said head. I am unable, however, to accept this contention in the circumstances of the present case. Apparently, only specific khudkasht fields, viz., numbers 10 and 52 of Jolwadi, were under the management of the Collector. The obvious presumption must be that any other khudkasht field not so specified was not affected so far by the Collector's proceedings, and there having been neither allegation nor proof that khudkasht field No. 40 corresponds to any portion of khudkasht fields Nos. 10 and 52, the inference must be that khudkasht field No. 47 was not under the management of the Collector.

I now pass to the first and second grounds of appeal. The first ground, which is to the effect that the present appellant took the lease of field No. 47 without notice of the mortgage, has obviously not got the slightest basis. The lease deed itself states that the field is mortgaged and that the lessors would be responsible to the mortgagees. Even so, however, it has been urged on behalf of the appellant that the fact that the lessee had notice of the mortgage is immaterial; that the lease was one given in the ordinary course of management and that the mortgagors at the time were competent to give such a lease. In this connection, I am wholly at a loss to understand the finding of the lower Court to the effect that the lease in question was given to the appellant in the ordinary course of management—a finding relating to issue No. 10 (b). In para. 38 of the lower Court's judgment, where the reasons for that finding are given, you can find no discussion, whatever of the relevant question involved.

I accept the principles laid down by Hallifax, A. J. C., in his judgment in Karu v. Pandia (2), but I find it wholly impossible to apply in a sense favourable to appellant the said principle to the circumstances of the present case. It is impossible to imagine that the giving of this lease of what apparently formed a large portion of the khudkasht field attached to the village share was an ordinary and reasonable incident of village management. The test is would the mortgagors have been likely to have given this lease themselves if they had known that they would continue indefinitely as the owners of the property? I think this question must undoubtedly be answered in the negative. The circumstances all suggest that the lease in question was not given in the ordinary course of management but was granted with the express object of meanwhile making a large profit for the mortgagors, or seriously depreciating the value of the security which the mortgagees were entitled to. In this connection, I find myself in full agreement with the remarks of Mittra, A. J. C., in Shanker Singh v. Hukumchand (3). The present lease was given in perpetuity. If the land was so valuable that a nazarana of Rs. 1,000 could fairly be demanded for it, it is impossible to suppose that the most serious loss would not be directly inflicted on the mortgagees when they subsequently came into the possession of the villages, for all they would receive would be a sum of Rs. 15-4 per year rental. The discrepancy between the capital sum of Rs. 1,000 paid and the yearly rental is sufficiently startling, and when we keep in mind also the fact that the lease was a perpetual one, it seems to me utterly impossible to postulate of the circumstances of the present case that the lease in question was an ordinary and reasonable act of ordinary management of the share on the part of the mortgagors.

The respondents have also raised, apparently for the first time in the course of argument in this Court, the contention that there has been no proof that the mortgagors were entitled to grant the lease and that presumably this power rested with the lambardar. This was a matter for a specific pleading in the lower Court and I am not prepared to entertain this plea now, but, altogether apart from it, I find it wholly impossible to hold that the lease in question was a bona fide act in the course of ordinary management. Over and above this, there is the undoubted fact that the present appellant had notice of the mortgage and under the lease-deed expressly assumed responsibility with reference thereto. On the fact of the present case, therefore, the said lease not being, in my opinion, an ordinary bona fide one carried through in the course of the ordinary management of the village and the lessee having accepted it on the terms he did, there can, in my opinion, be no question but that field No. 47 is liable under the decree obtained by the respondents.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed. The appellant must bear the respondents' costs. Costs in the lower Court as already ordered.

Burmese Buddhist Law—Husband and wife—Desertion—Divorce—Forfeiture of husband's property —'Virgin couple', meaning of.

Under the Burmese Buddhist Law although desertion by husband is a ground for adjudging divorce, it does not cause forfeiture to the wife of the whole of the property of the husband joint or separate. [p. 18, col. 2.]

But in view of the general rules of the Burmese Buddhist Law as regards the interest which the wife obtains in the husband's property at the time of the marriage the Court may award a reasonable share of the husband's property to the wife on her divorce. [p. 19, col. 2.]

[The meaning of 'virgin spouse' considered but not decided.]

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the High Court, Rangoon (Heald and Chari, JJ.), dated the 27th February, 1925, reported as 88 Ind. Cas. 402, affirming a decree of the District Judge, Myaungmya, dated the 13th December, 1923.

Messrs. Dunne K. C. and Raikes, for the Appellant.

Mr. Pennell, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Sir Lancelot Sanderson.—This is an appeal by Maung Po Nyun, who was the defendant in the suit, against a decree of the High Court of Judicature at Rangoon, dated the 27th February, 1925, affirming a decree of the District Judge of Myaungmya, dated the 13th December, 1923.

The plaintiff, who is the respondent in this appeal, brought the suit against her husband, claiming a divorce on account of his desertion and a partition of the properties specified in the Schedules A and B of the plaint. She alleged that she was entitled to one-third of the properties in Schedule A and to one-sixth of the profits in Schedule B.

The learned District Judge made a decree granting the plaintiff a divorce and the shares in the above-mentioned properties which she claimed. The defendant appealed to the High Court, which dismissed his appeal with costs.

At the hearing of the appeal before their Lordships, the learned Counsel, who appeared for the appellant-defendant, did not contest the plaintiff's right to a decree for divorce, and the arguments on both sides were confined to that part of the decree which awarded to the plaintiff one-third of the properties mentioned in Schedule A and one-sixth of the profits specified in Schedule B.

The learned Counsel for the appellant-defendant did not contest the plaintiff's right to the one-sixth of the profits in Schedule B, but he argued that the plaintiff was entitled merely to one-sixth of the property comprised in Schedule A and not to one-third thereof, as decreed by the Courts in Burma.

The appeal, however, involves much more than the point which has been stated above, and that is by reason of a principle which was adopted by the Courts in Burma and upon which they based their judgments.

For the moment it may briefly be referred to in the words of the learned District Judge as follows:—"Where a divorce is adjudged through the fault of one party, the innocent party obtains all the property, including the joint property as well as the separate property of the guilty spouse."

It is clear, therefore, from the above-mentioned statement, that this appeal involves a question of great importance, and it is necessary for their Lordships to decide whether this statement of the law, which must obviously have far-reaching effects, can be supported.

The facts of the case may be shortly stated as follows:—

The defendant had married another wife before he married the plaintiff. The first wife lived with the defendant and his adoptive mother for some time, and then, in consequence of quarrels, the first wife left the defendant and went to live with her parents.

A few months later the defendant expressed a desire to marry the plaintiff, and his mother accordingly approached the plaintiff's parents with a view to their daughter's marriage.

The defendant had told his mother that he had severed his connection with his first wife, and accordingly the defendant's mother, when asked by the plaintiff's parents as to the first marriage, assured them that the defendant had divorced his first wife.

The plaintiff's parents, having received this assurance, consented to their daughter's marriage. She was married the same day and she went to live with the defendant and his mother.

A few months later the defendant's mother died.

The defendant continued to live with the plaintiff for about two months longer, and then, in or about April, 1920, he left her and went to live with his first wife, whom, in fact, he had not divorced. The suit was filed in September, 1923, more than three years after the plaintiff was deserted by the defendant, and it was found by the learned District Judge, and his finding has not been disputed, that during the period from April, 1920, up to September, 1923, the defendant did not resume conjugal relations with the plaintiff, and did not give her any maintenance.

The learned Judge found that the defendant deserted the plaintiff and that the marriage was brought about by the above-mentioned misrepresentation, that his connection with his first wife had been severed, and he held that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for divorce. The High Court agreed that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for divorce, and that part of the decree, as already stated, has not been contested before their Lordships.

It appears that the defendant's mother died in January, 1920, and that about four months before she died she had given to the defendant by deed about 185 acres, which were part of the 233·38 acres mentioned in Schedule A.

After her death her inheritance was divided, the defendant getting the house and the remainder of the property mentioned in Schedule A, which included 29 acres which had been given shortly after the defendant's marriage with the plaintiff.

On the question of partition, both the Courts in Burma held that, inasmuch as the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce on the ground of the defendant's desertion, she was, strictly speaking, entitled to all the husband's property, except the first wife's interest therein; or, stating the same proposition in another way, that the plaintiff was entitled to all the husband's interest in the property, which would be considerably more than the shares which the plaintiff had claimed in her plaint. The learned Judges of the High Court expressed the opinion that it was difficult to understand on what principle the plaintiff's claim, was based; but they came to the conclusion that as she had confined her claim to the shares mentioned in the plaint and had obtained a decree in respect thereof, they saw no reason for saying that the decree was wrong or that the defendant had been prejudiced by it.

The question whether the plaintiff was entitled to all the husband's interest in the property was argued at great length, and the attention of their Lordships was drawn to the translations of many of the Dhammathats and to many reported decisions.

Their Lordships do not think it necessary to refer to them in detail, because it is clear as was admitted by the learned Counsel who appeared for the plaintiff, that there is no text which imposes forfeiture of property upon a husband who deserts his wife, and that there is no reported case in which a decree for forfeiture of his property has been made against a husband by reason of his desertion of his wife or one of his wives.

Further, the learned Judges of the High Court stated that "it is admitted that the Burmese law books do not lay down any rule for partition on the divorce of the husband by one of two or more wives of equal status, and that there is no case-law on the subject. It is, therefore, necessary to decide the matter in accordance with the principles of justice, equity and good conscience, having regard...to the general rules of Burmese Buddhist Law so far as those rules can be applied."

Their Lordships desire to make it clear that the opinion expressed by them is confined to the particular facts of this case and the question arising in respect thereof; viz., assuming that the defendant deserted the plaintiff, his second wife, in April, 1920, and that for more than three years he did not resume conjugal relations and gave her no maintenance, and that consequently the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for a divorce, was she entitled to the whole of the husband's interest in the property, which was the subject-matter in the suit?

The learned Counsel for the appellant argued strenuously that on the true construction of the plaint, the suit was really based on an allegation of divorce by mutual consent.

Their Lordships are not able to accept that argument, and the case must be considered upon the basis of the findings of fact of the Courts in India.

The learned District Judge began his judgment on this part of the case by saying, "The parties will have to be considered as virgin couple."

Before his marriage with the plaintiff, the defendant had been married to another woman, who was alive at the time of the marriage with the plaintiff, and from whom he had not been divorced.

The plaintiff, of course, had not been married before, and, while some indications are to be found in the texts to the effect that where the spouse in that position is the aggrieved party, the union may be so described in proceedings for divorce, in their Lordships' opinion, it is not necessary in this case to decide the point and they must not be taken as affirming the above mentioned proposition.

The learned District Judge then proceeded to the statement which has already been quoted, and which for convenience may be re-stated, as follows:—

"Where a divorce is adjudged through the fault of one party, the innocent party obtains all the property, including the joint property as well as the separate property of the guilty spouse; but of course, the share of the head wife must be excluded."

In their Lordships' opinion, this statement is made in too wide and too general terms.

In the first place, it takes no account of the difference between the position, rights and duties of the husband and those of the wife in Burmese Law.

It is clear that the Dhammathats recognised the difference in many respects, which it is not necessary to mention in detail.

In the second place, as has already been stated, there is no case in which a wife has obtained a decree of forfeiture of all her husband's interest in the property on the ground of his desertion.

It is also the fact that there is no case in which a wife has claimed such a forfeiture, and even in the case before their Lordships the plaintiff has not made such a claim.

As already mentioned, the Dhammathats do not contain any text which provides that if the husband deserts his wife, or one of his wives, she is entitled to the whole of her husband's interest in the property.

In the Digest of Burmese Buddhist Law arranged by U Gaung, Vol. II, dealing with Marriage, §. 312 (Manugye), desertion is dealt with, and some of the rights of the parties ensuing upon desertion, such as the right to marry again, are described.

If it had been the law that the husband would forfeit all his interest in the property, joint or separate, if he deserted his wife, or one of his wives, for three years and left her without maintenance, it is almost inconceivable that there would not have been found in the Dhammathats a statement of the law to that effect.

The proposition which the Courts in Burma adopted as the basis of their judgment, viz., that because the defendant deserted the plaintiff she was entitled to divorce with possession of all the husband's interest in the property, the subject-matter of the suit, is in itself a startling proposition, and, if adopted, would have very far-reaching effects.

There is no text in the Dhammathats or in the Burmese Buddhist law books to support it, there is no case-law on the subject, and the respondent's learned Counsel was not able to draw their Lordships' attention to any case in which even a claim based on such a proposition had been made.

In these circumstances, their Lordships are not prepared to accept and endorse the above-mentioned proposition.

This, however, does not dispose of the appeal, because it still remains to be considered whether the appellant-defendant has succeeded in showing sufficient reason to justify their Lordships in interfering with the decree which the plaintiff in fact obtained as to her shares in the property and the profits thereof.

In deciding this question, their Lordships think it is material to take into consideration the general rules of the Burmese Buddhist Law as regards the interest which the wife obtains in the husband's property at the time of the marriage, and in the property acquired by him after the marriage, and the fact that the Dhammathats treat the division of property as part of the law of divorce, as to which there does not seem to be any serious dispute.

In their opinion, it is also material and important to consider the facts of this case, as, for instance, that the marriage with the plaintiff was brought about by misrepresentation, that the plaintiff was an entirely innocent party, that, shortly stated, the facts relating to the desertion were of an aggravated nature and quite unjustifiable, and that desertion, where there is a duty to comfort and support, is regarded by the Burmese as a serious offence.

Taking these matters into consideration and the above-mentioned rules of the Burmese Law as to the wife's interest in her husband's property, their Lordships are not prepared to say that the decree appealed from, which awarded to the plaintiff the shares in the properties in suit specified therein, was unreasonable or contrary to justice, equity and good conscience.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

First appeals from the decrees of the Sub-Judge, Budaun, dated the 31st May, 1924.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Harnandan Prasad, for the Appellants.

Mr. U. S. Bajpai, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—These two appeals arise out of two suits which were tried separately by two Subordinate Judges of Budaun. But as the claims were based upon similar causes of action and relate to the same property, and as the same questions arise for determination in both cases the two appeals have been heard together and may be disposed of by one judgment.

The following pedigree will serve to show the nature of the claim put forward in either suit:

The property in respect of which the two suits were brought was admitted in the Court below to have been at one time the absolute estate (stridhan) of a lady named Radhika Rani, who was the mother of Musammat Jhuna Kuar, wife of Bhola Prasad.

On the death of her mother the property descended to Musammat Jhuna Kuar who, on the 13th August, 1899, executed a Will (Ex. 1, page 20, of the paper-book of F. A. No. 324 of 1924). She claimed to be the full owner of the property and disposed of it in favour of her husband Bhola Prasad and her three sons, Ishri Prasad, Jainti Prasad and Ram Prasad.

The construction of this Will is in controversy in both the appeals now before us; for the present it is sufficient to say that the plaintiffs in the two suits are founding their title upon the Will. Jhuna Kuar died a few days after this Will had been executed, and it is an admitted fact that her husband Bhola Prasad then came into possession of the property.

In the year 1902 Bibi Durga Kuar, the daughter of Jhuna Kuar, put forward a claim to this property on the ground that she was entitled to it by inheritance from her mother. She disputed the right of her father Bhola Prasad to get the property under Jhuna Kuar's Will, and she was, apparently, about to bring a suit to enforce her claim when she and her father agreed to submit their respective claims to arbitration by a deed executed on the 10th August, 1902, (Ex. 11, page 21, paper-book of F. A. No. 324 of 1924). On the 14th August, 1902, an award was delivered, which declared that Bhola Prasad was the owner of the lands now in dispute under the Will of Jhuna Kuar. The arbitrators, however, were of opinion that Bhola Prasad should be generous towards his daughter and they awarded her a 3-biswa share in the item of landed property situated in Mauza Dudhari.

Subsequently, and before his death, which took place in 1921, Bhola Prasad lost the rest of the immoveable property which came to him by the Will. It passed into the hands of Ganga Din and his wife Musammât Dulari, who are the contesting defendants in both the suits and are in possession. The first of the two suits, the one which has given rise to First Appeal No. 324 of 1924, was brought by Ram Prasad, the only surviving son of Bhola Prasad. He put forward the case that Bhola Prasad took only an estate for life under the Will of Jhuna Kuar, and that he (plaintiff), as remainderman, was entitled to possession after his father's death.

The defence to the claim was that Bhola Prasad was not a mere life-tenant of the property, but was the absolute owner. It was pleaded, first, that the Will gave Bhola Prasad an absolute estate and that there was no valid gift over to the sons. In the next place it was pleaded that Bhola Prasad had acquired an absolute estate by adverse possession. This defence was based upon the assertion that Jhuna Kuar herself having succeeded by inheritance to her mother's stridhan had no more than a life-interest and could not dispose of the property by Will. The real heir, after Jhuna's death, was her daughter, Musammât Durga Kuar, and, therefore, Bhola took possession without title, and, having been in for more than twelve years, had acquired a full title by prescription.

Again it was pleaded that the arbitration proceedings in 1902, to which we have already referred, constituted a "family settlement" which was binding upon the plaintiff Ram Prasad, and which conferred an absolute title upon Bhola Prasad; and lastly it was suggested that the suit was barred by estoppel, both under s. 41, Transfer of Property Act and s. 115, Evidence Act.

The Subordinate Judge overruled these defences, and gave Ram Prasad a decree for one-half of the property in suit. His decision, in substance, was that Bhola Prasad having entered under the Will was estopped from denying the title of his testatrix. He found that the Will gave Bhola Prasad only a life-interest and that there was a gift over by way of remainder to the sons of Bhola Prasad, which neither Bhola nor the defendants who are his successors-in-interest could be permitted to dispute.

One of the three sons to whom an estate in remainder was given had died without issue in 1911: his name was Jainti Prasad. His vested interest, therefore, passed to his two brothers Ishri and Ram Prasad enlarging their shares to one-half each. Ram Prasad was, therefore, declared to be entitled to a half share in the property in suit and a decree was made accordingly.

After Ram Prasad's suit had been decreed, the two sons of Ishri Prasad, who had died in 1917, came forward to claim the other half of the property. They too founded their case upon the Will of Jhuna Kunwar, but their suit failed. The Subordinate Judge who dealt with their suit was of opinion that the arbitration award of 1902 put these plaintiffs out of Court. He held that the arbitration proceedings amounted to a family settlement under which the rightful owner, i. e., Musammât Durga Kunwar, gave the bulk of the property to her father, Bhola Prasad, who thereupon acquired an absolute title.

First Appeal No. 410 of 1925 is directed against this decree in the second suit. The plaintiffs are the appellants and maintain that they ought to have been given a half share on the same grounds as Ram Prasad, their uncle, got a half share in the earlier suit.

To come now to the questions for determination in the two appeals, it is to be observed, first, that it is common ground that Musammât Jhuna Kunwar had no interest in this property extending beyond her lifetime. It was the stridhan of her mother Radhika Rani, and descended, in the first instance, to Jhuna Kunwar who took merely the ordinary Hindu female's estate. On her decease the property ought to have descended in turn to her daughter Durga Kunwar with a similar estate. After Durga Kunwar's death (she is still alive) the son of Jhuna Kunwar, that is Ram Prasad, would take as heir if he survived his sister. Bhola Prasad, the husband of na Kunwar, had no title whatever to this property.

The situation, then, is that Jhuna Kunwar, with only a life-estate in the property, but believing herself to have an absolute estate which she could devise made this Will of the 13th August, 1899, which purported to confer upon her husband an interest which was to take effect immediately upon her death. It is not to be doubted that Bhola Prasad did enter under the Will. This is quite plain from the recital contained in the deed by which he and Durga Kunwar agreed to submit their dispute to arbitration: (cf. Ex. 11, page 21, paper-book, F. A. No. 324 of 1924). We cannot accept the contention that Bhola Prasad got possession otherwise than under the Will.

As to the construction of the Will both Subordinate Judges have held that Bhola Prasad took nothing more than a life-estate, and, in our opinion, that decision is correct. When the document is read as a whole there can be no doubt as to the intention of Jhuna Kunwar. She first declares that, if she dies before her husband, he will be the owner of her entire property, but she then goes on to say that "he may enjoy the income from the said property up to the time of his death" and that, after his death, her sons will be entitled to the estate. The Will concludes with a direction that in no event shall Bhola Prasad's issue by a second wife, in case he marries again, take any portion of Jhuna Kunwar's estate.

It is plain beyond all argument, therefore, that nothing more than a life-interest was conferred upon Bhola Prasad.

As for the arbitration award, which settled the dispute between Bhola Prasad and Durga Kunwar in 1902, it can have no effect upon the interests of the plaintiffs in the present suits. They were no parties to the proceedings and are in no way bound by them. The case was not one of a family settlement. Bhola Prasad's two eldest sons, Ishri and Jainti, were alive then and of full age (see the recital in the Will of 1899), and it is not possible to conceive that there could be any arrangement by way of family settlement to which they were not parties.

The Subordinate Judge who tried the second suit was wrong in holding that the award could affect the plaintiff's rights either as a family settlement or in any other way.

The matter in dispute, therefore, is reduced to a narrow compass. There are two sets of plaintiffs setting up title to property under a Will. Admittedly their testator had no devisable interest in the property and the plaintiffs can succeed only by showing that the defendants who derive their title from Bhola Prasad are estopped from denying the right of Jhuna Kunwar to make this Will.

The Subordinate Judge who decided the earlier of the two suits was of opinion that the defendants were so estopped. The other Subordinate Judge thought that, if Bhola Prasad's title was derived from the Will, then he and his representatives-in-interest would be so estopped; but, as already explained, he came to the conclusion that Bhola Prasad's title was acquired under the award and not under the Will—a conclusion which we consider erroneous. The first Subordinate Judge was, in our opinion, clearly right. The case is covered by the rule laid down in the leading case of Board v. Board (1), namely, that a person who claims under a Will, and retains possession under the Will, is estopped from denying its validity as against everybody interested in the Will.

There has been much case-law on this subject, and in the course of the arguments we have been referred to practically all the authorities in the English reports.

We think the law is correctly reproduced in the following passage taken from Spencer Bower on Estoppel by Representation, para. 734:

"One who obtains, or accepts, or retains possession of property under a Will and who neither has, nor professes to have, any title thereto except under the Will, is estopped, as against any remainderman or other person claiming under the same Will from asserting that the testator was not entitled to such an estate in the property as he purported to devise or bequeath and, generally, from setting up any title to the property in himself which is independent of, and adverse to, the Will, or any interest of a different kind from that which he would have taken if the property had passed by the Will as it was impliedly represented by him to have passed. The above formula, it will be observed, is confined to cases where the party not only professes to have, but actually has, no title to the property except under the Will."

(1) (1874) 9 Q. B. 48; 43 L. J. Q. B. 4; 29 L. T. 459; 22 W. R. 206.

It is this rule which has to be applied to the case now before us. We have already explained that when his wife died Bhola Prasad had not, and could not have had, any title to the property except under the Will made by his wife. The person entitled in law to the property on Jhuna Kunwar's death was her daughter Durga Kunwar.

Bhola Prasad, as we have said, entered into possession under the Will and the consequence is that he and those who claim under him are debarred now from asserting that Jhuna Kunwar was not entitled to such an estate in the property as she purported to devise. Nor can the defendants now representing Bhola Prasad set up any title in him or themselves independent of and adverse to the Will. The plaintiffs, who claim under the same Will as remaindermen, are entitled to the benefit of this estoppel.

It has, however, been strenuously argued that the rule in Board v. Board (1) should not be applied here. It is said that the principle of estoppel laid down in that case has been held not to apply to a certain type of cases of which Paine v. Jones (2) is an example.

This question is discussed by Stirling, J., in his judgment in Dalton v. Fitzgerald (3). Speaking of the cases which have arisen under Wills he divides them into two classes.

The first is, where a testator having either no title or an imperfect title to land devises it by specific description to or upon trust for a person for life with remainders over. Board v. Board (1) is a case of this class where the testator being simply a tenant by courtesy, had nothing to devise. In such cases the doctrine of estoppel is applied and, according to Stirling, J., no doubt has ever been thrown upon that class of cases.

The second class is the one where a testator having a good title to property has not effectually devised it and the tenant for life of the property effectually devised by the Will has entered just as if it had been included in a valid devise and acquired by possession a title against the heir. Such cases, of which Paine v. Jones (2) is a leading example, arose most frequently under the law as it stood prior to the Wills Act when a testator was incompetent to devise land acquired subsequently to his Will. Stirling, J., points out that there is a conflict of opinion regarding the application of the doctrine of estoppel in cases of this type.

However that may be, it is manifest that the case we are now considering does not fall within this second class: it clearly falls within the first. It is not pretended that Jhuna Kunwar had a good title to this property, that is, a title which she could effectually devise; and that she failed to dispose of it by Will effectually. On the contrary the case is that she had a defective or limited title which she disposed of on the assumption that it was absolute and perfect. That is the case of Board v. Board (1) where the testator, a mere tenant by the courtesy, assumed that he had a devisable interest. He created a life-estate in favour of his daughter with remainder to his grandson. The daughter entered under the Will, and it was held that the defendant claiming through her was estopped as against the plaintiff, the assignee of the remainderman, from disputing the validity of the Will.

For these reasons we hold that in the two suits now under appeal the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed; there was in neither case any valid defence to the claim.

In First Appeal No. 324 of 1924 judgment of the trial Court was in favour of the plaintiff and was right. This appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

In First Appeal No. 410 of 1925 the claim was dismissed wrongly by the Subordinate Judge. The appeal is, therefore, allowed, the decree of the Court below is set aside and the suit is decreed with costs to the plaintiff in both Courts.

By the Court.—As First Appeal No. 410 of 1925 has been decreed, the result is that the case will go back to the Court of first instance for determination of the mesne profits which were claimed in the plaint.

ORIGINAL CIVIL JURISDICTION.

BAI PANBAI—APPLICANT

MORARJI KANJI—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Succession Act (XXXIX of 1925), s. 317—Probate—Inventory and accounts, how to be filed—Procedure—Remedy of parties interested.

The intention of the Legislature under s. 317 of the Succession Act appears to be that the inventory and accounts filed under that section should, so far as the proceedings on the Testamentary Side are concerned, be regarded as final. The protection afforded to parties interested in the Will is that if the inventory and the accounts are intentionally false in any particular, the executor or administrator makes himself liable to punishment under the Penal Code. Another remedy open to the interested parties would be to file an action against the executor or administrator questioning the correctness of the accounts. [p. 24, col. 2; p. 25, col. 1.]

The practice of the Bombay High Court is to require an executor to file the inventory and accounts with the Testamentary Registrar. The executor is not required to pass his inventory and accounts before the Commissioner for taking accounts. [p. 24, col. 2.]

FACTS.—One Amarsey died leaving a Will providing for the payment of Rs. 100 per month to his widow Bai Panbai for maintenance. She was also allowed the use of certain ornaments of the value of Rs. 5,000 during her life. The executor Morarji did not file his accounts as he was bound to do under the Indian Succession Act. Panbai applied to the Court for compelling him to do so and he filed the accounts under the orders of the Court. Panbai alleged that the accounts were incorrect and prayed that a Commissioner should be appointed before whom the executor may be ordered to pass his inventory and accounts.

Mr. Kanga, Advocate-General, for the Applicant.

Mr. Taraporewala, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—[His Lordship stated the facts and proceeded:—] Bai Panbai's application is based on the English practice in the Probate Division. Williams on Executors, Vol II, page 1663, (11th Edition), quotes that practice to be as follows:—

"An executor or administrator may be compelled to exhibit an inventory, and render an account of his administration of the personal estate of his testator or intestate in the Probate Division at the instance of a legatee or next of kin, or of a creditor; but neither an executor nor administrator can be cited by the Probate Division ex officio to account."

According to Tristram and Coote's Probate Practice, page 324 (latest edition), the proceedings are instituted by means of a summons in Chambers.

The Advocate-General on behalf of the applicant contends that our Court is bound to follow the English practice under the provisions of r. 609 of the High Court Rules. That rule provides that:—

"In cases not provided for by this Chapter, or by the rules of procedure laid down in the Indian Succession Act or by Probate and Administration Act, 1881, or by the Civil Procedure Code, the practice and procedure of the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice in England shall be followed so far as they are applicable and not inconsistent with this Chapter and the said Acts."

Section 317 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, provides that:—

"(1) An executor or administrator shall, within six months from the grant of Probate or Letters of Administration, or within such further time as the Court which granted the Probate or Letters may appoint, exhibit in that Court an inventory containing a full and true estimate of all the property in possession, and all the credits, and also all the debts owing by any person to which the executor or administrator is entitled in that character; and shall in like manner, within one year from the grant or within such further time as the said Court may appoint, exhibit an account of the estate, showing the assets which have come to his hands and the manner in which they have been applied or disposed of....."

"(4) The exhibition of an intentionally false inventory or account under this section shall be deemed to be an offence under s. 193 of that Code (The Indian Penal Code)."

The practice of our Court has been to require an inventory and accounts to be filed with the Testamentary Registrar. The executor or administrator is not required to pass his inventory and accounts before the Commissioner for taking accounts.

I am of opinion that the practice followed by our Court so far is correct. The intention of the Legislature under s. 317 of the Indian Succession Act appears to be that the inventory and accounts filed under that section should, so far as the proceedings on the Testamentary Side are concerned, be regarded as final. The protection afforded to parties interested in the Will is that if the inventory and the accounts are intentionally false in any particular, the executor or administrator makes himself liable to punishment under the Indian Penal Code. The other remedy open to the interested parties would be to file an action against the executor or administrator, questioning the correctness of the accounts.

In Sarat Sundari Barmani v. Uma Prosad Roy Chowdhry (1) the point before the learned Judges was whether it was open to the District Judge of his own motion to re-open an account which was certified by his predecessor as "accounts checked and reported to be correct" and to compel the executor to pass his accounts before an officer of the Court. The Appeal Court held that all that the District Judge had to do was to see that the inventory and accounts satisfied the requirements of the section, that is, that the inventory appeared on inspection to be a full and true estimate of all the property, credits and debts and that the account on inspection appeared really to be a true one showing the assets and their disposal (page 636*):—

"To ascertain this it would be necessary that the inventory and account should be passed under some examinations by the Judge's staff so as to detect manifest mistakes or omissions. If such were discussed, the papers would not satisfy the section; and the Judge would have power to require the executor or administrator to amend the account in order to comply with the section; and for this purpose the section empowers him to extend the time."

The learned Judges at page 639* mentioned that reference had been made to the English practice and held that English practice was hardly a guide in India because the provisions of the Indian Succession Act differed very materially from the law in England.

In my opinion, whatever rights the applicant had, as the legatee under the Will, are now merged in the agreement of December 20, 1923.

The learned Advocate-General contends that she is entitled to come in under the provisions of the English practice as next of kin. The English practice refers to next of kin in connection with an administrator and not an executor. If the applicant has any rights dehors the Will, her proper remedy is to file an action against the executor of her husband's estate to claim an enhanced maintenance or a widow's life-estate as she may be advised. The present proceedings, in my opinion, are misconceived. The summons, therefore, will be discharged.

Having regard to the fact that this point had not before come up for decision in any case in this Court of which I am aware, and as the applicant appears to have been misled by the English practice on the point, I think the proper order will be that there should be no order as to costs. Counsel certified.

This amount was fixed at Rs. 31-5 and the total price of the paddy together with road and public cesses were to be paid according to certain kists. In a suit for rent the landlord claimed the price of paddy which was not delivered at its market price on the date of suit :

JUDGMENT.—These four appeals arise out of four suits for rent. The only question in controversy is whether, according to the terms of the patta by which rent was payable partly in cash and partly in kind by delivering a certain quantity of paddy, for non-delivery of the paddy, the present market price should be recovered by the plaintiff or the price stated in the patta. After stating that the rent will be payable in cash and in paddy, the words in the patta are to this effect: "If for an unavoidable reason you are unable to pay the paddy its market price at the rate of Rs. 4 per pali should be paid. The amount is Rs. 34-5. The total price of the paddy together with road and public works cesses amounting to Rs. 50 should be paid according to the kists given below and you will take a receipt after payment of the money." Then it follows—"Except on the ground that all the lands of the mahal lay fallow, you shall not pay the price of the paddy." Then follow the other provisions which it is unnecessary to mention. At the end of the document, the kists are given. It is stated that the cash rent is Rs. 15-11 and the price of paddy is Rs. 34-5 making a total of Rs. 50. Lastly, different kists are given in which the amount of Rs. 50 was to be paid. The Munsif gave a decree to the plaintiff according to the price of the paddy fixed in the patta, that is to say Rs. 34-5-0. The District Judge reversed that decision and gave the plaintiff a decree at the rate claimed, viz., the present market price of the paddy. On appeal by the defendants it is contended on their behalf that, having regard to the terms in the patta, they are not bound to pay more than the price of the paddy stated in that document. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent that that price was fixed in the happening of one event only, that is, if for any unavoidable reason the tenant was unable to pay the value stated instead of the paddy if the whole of the land remained fallow, otherwise, the plaintiff is entitled to get the present market value of the paddy. Upon reading the entire patta we are unable to agree with the District Judge and to accept the contention on behalf of the respondent.

ent. Even if it be considered to be a suit for damages, the amount of damages is mentioned in the deed itself. That being so, we cannot say that the amount should be in lieu of the paddy at one rate if the tenant cannot deliver the paddy for any unavoidable reason and at a different rate for any other reason which the Court does not consider to be unavoidable. The question that no unavoidable reason was pleaded seems to us to be quite immaterial because it is too vague for any Court of Justice to take cognizance of. The defendant may say "I am too poor" or other things may be said in support of his inability to pay. These are matters which cannot be taken into consideration. Where, as a matter of fact, the landlord has chosen to fix the price and stated the kists in which the rent is to be paid on that basis it must be considered that at the time the landlord thought that the highest amount that could be realised on account of the paddy was fixed under the contract if by some chance the price of the paddy has increased subsequently, it does not seem to be right that that contract is to be given the go-by by giving the present market price to the plaintiff. In this view, the decree of the Subordinate Judge must be set aside and that of the Munsif restored with proportionate costs in both the Courts.

This judgment will govern all the four appeals

Co-sharers—Partition—Plot of land left joint—One co-sharer taking exclusive possession and planting trees—Right of other co-sharers to joint possession of land and trees.

In a partition between co-sharers a certain plot of land was left undivided for the joint use of all the co-sharers. One of the co-sharers took exclusive possession of the said plot and planted trees thereon. In a suit by the other co-sharers for joint possession,

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to joint possession of the land and the trees planted thereon.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Sitapur, dated the 4th June, 1927, in Civil Appeal No. 55 of 1926, modifying that of the Munsif, Bismar, dated the 29th November, 1926.

Mr. Ali Zaheer, for the Appellants.

Mr. Bishambhar Nath Srivastava, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The appellants in this case are co-sharers in the village who have taken exclusive possession of a plot which is recorded as being in the Shamlat patti of all the co-sharers. The appellants have planted trees in this plot in an attempt to incorporate it in their own grove. The plaintiffs in the suit are members of the co-parcenary body who put forward the reasonable plea that they should be given joint possession in the land which was actually given them as joint land by the partition. The suit has been resisted on many grounds but it is evident that the appellants' main interest is to retain their trees. In argument I have been referred to the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council reported in Midnapur Zamindari Co. v. Naresh Narayan Roy (1). Their Lordships in that case remarked that "in India each co-sharer in common land is entitled to cultivate in his own interests in a proper and husbandlike manner any part of the lands which is not being cultivated by another of his co-sharers.....Such an exclusive use of lands held in common by a co sharer is not an ouster of the co-sharers.....When co-sharers cannot agree as to how any land held by them in common may be used, the remedy of any co-sharer who objects to the exclusive use by another co sharer of the lands held in common is to obtain a partition of the lands." On the basis of this ruling I am asked to hold that the proper course for the plaintiffs to have adopted was to file a suit for partition. Obviously such a course is impossible in a case where partition has already been effected, and all that the parties wish to do is to sub-divide a small portion of land left for the joint use of the co-sharers. In my opinion this is a case in which the other co-sharers are fully entitled to get joint possession of the plot and so far the decree of the lower Appellate Court is correct. I do not, however, understand from that decree whether the lower Appellate Court meant to uphold the decision of the Court of first instance, to the effect that joint possession was to be given by uprooting the trees, nor do I see how joint possession can be given by uprooting the trees; rather it appears to me that by planting trees on joint land the appellants must be assumed to have been acting in the interests of all the co-sharers who will all alike profit from the planting of these trees. How they can enforce their rights to the profits of the trees by uprooting them is not clear to me. All that, in my opinion, the plaintiffs are entitled to is a further declaration of their rights in the enjoyment of the land, that is to say it should be made clear that they are entitled to the use of the land. It was the finding of the lower Court that the land was used for irrigation purposes and if it is found that the appellants' trees interfere with irrigation it might be necessary to remove them, but there is no such finding of the Courts and I have no reason to suppose that the planting of trees interferes in any way with the use of the land for irrigation. I, therefore, uphold the judgment of the lower Appellate Court but add to his decree these words, that "the trees along with the land remain in the joint possession of the parties and that all rights formerly exercised by the co-parcenary body of the land, such as the rights to irrigation, shall remain intact." Under the circumstances the parties will bear their own costs in this appeal. The orders as to costs in the Courts below are maintained.

The Crown has a right, in the winding-up of a Company under the Companies Act, to the payment of its debts in priority to all the other creditors of the Company. [p. 29, col. 2.]

Section 229 of the Companies Act read with s. 228 of the Act makes the provisions of s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act applicable in the case of insolvent Companies. [ibid.]

Wherever a Statute has dealt with the powers of a Crown under its prerogative, the prerogative must be taken to be merged in the Statute and the powers previously within the prerogative can be exercised only in the manner and subject to the limitations contained in the Statute. [p. 28, col. 1.]

De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd. v. Regem (1) and In re Webb & Co. (Smithfield) (5), applied.

Mr. Kanga, Advocate-General, for the Secretary of State.

JUDGMENT.—An important question under the Indian Companies Act has been raised in this liquidation as regards the right of the Crown in a winding-up to payment of its debt in priority to all other creditors of the Company.

The Secretary of State for India is a judgment-creditor of the Company in liquidation for Rs. 3,922-15-8 including costs, for monies due in respect of certain trade or commercial dealings between the parties, and he claims that his debt is a Crown debt and that under the Indian Companies Act it is entitled in the winding-up to priority of payment over all other creditors of the Company.

It is not disputed that the debt is a Crown debt but the liquidator denies that it is entitled to priority under the Indian Companies Act.

It is to be observed at the outset that the Crown has two distinct prerogatives of which it may avail itself both in bankruptcy and in the winding-up of Companies. The one is that the Crown is not bound by the Statute unless by express mention or necessary implication, and can, therefore, pursue its remedies irrespective of any limitations imposed by such a Statute. The other prerogative is the right to be paid in priority to all other creditors of equal degree, whenever the rights of the Crown and the subject come into competition. Where, however, the Legislature has dealt with the powers under the prerogative, the prerogative must be taken to be merged in the Statute, and the powers previously within the prerogative can be exercised only in the manner and subject to the limitations contained in the Statute. See De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd., v. Regem (1).

In these proceedings, however, no question of the aforesaid common law prerogative of the Crown arises, for the right of the Crown to priority has been dealt with by the Indian Companies Act and the argument on both sides has been confined to the provisions of that Act.

In the insolvency of an individual all Crown debts are entitled to priority of payment over all other debts under s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act; and the Advocate-General contends that these provisions of the Insolvency Law have been assimilated in the Indian Companies Act and made applicable in the winding-up of a Company in liquidation by s. 229 of the Indian Companies Act, thereby putting Crown debts in winding-up in the same position as Crown debts in insolvency. His case, therefore, rests on s. 229 read with s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act.

On the other hand the liquidator contends that s. 229 has no application. For, it does not refer to matters of substantive law in insolvency but only to the "rule" made under the Insolvency Act, and it is such "rules" only which are made applicable in winding up and these "rules" contain no provision for priority of Crown debts.

It is further contended on behalf of the liquidator that the only provision in the Indian Companies Act dealing with the priority of Crown debts is contained in s. 230 of the Act which expressly gives priority only to those Crown debts which are therein mentioned, and that, therefore, s. 230 must be regarded as exhaustive and Crown debts not included in the section must be taken to have been excluded from priority. It is urged that the Crown debt in question obviously does not fall under s. 230, for that section provides for priority only of all "revenue, taxes, cesses and rates payable to the Crown" whereas the Crown debt in question is merely a trading debt, and it has, therefore, no priority over the other creditors.

Put in the form of an issue, the contentions of the parties, therefore, come to this: whether the priority of payment of all Crown debts which prevails in insolveney under s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act obtains equally in the winding-up of a Company in liquidation by reason of s. 229 of the Indian Companies Act, or, whether only those Crown debts have priority in winding-up which are expressly mentioned in s. 230 of the Act. The answer to this depends on whether s. 229 introduces the provisions of s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act into the Indian Companies Act.

Section 49 (1) (a) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act provides that "in the distribution of the property of the insolvent there shall be paid in priority to all other debts—(a) all debts due to the Crown or to any local authority," so that in insolvency all Crown debts are given priority over all other debts of an insolvent. Section 229 of the Indian Companies Act provides that "in the winding-up of an insolvent Company the same rules shall prevail and be observed with regard to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors and to debts provable...as are in force for the time being under the Law of Insolvency with respect to the estates of persons adjudged insolvent." It is, therefore, argued that under s. 229 debts due to the Crown in winding-up are entitled to the same priority which they have under s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, and that, therefore, the Crown debt in this liquidation is entitled to priority.

So far as the argument is based on the use of the word "rules" in s. 229 I am unable to accept the liquidator's contention. The "rules" referred to in s. 229, have reference to "the rules that shall prevail and be observed with regard to the respective rights, etc." which can refer only to matters of substantive law, such as are contained in s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. To place a construction that by these rules is meant the rules framed under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act would be repugnant to the context. The words in s. 229 "the same rules shall prevail...as to debts provable" are wide enough to bring in that part of the insolvency law which directs which kind of debt is to be paid in priority to others, that is to say, the provisions of s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act apply in cases of winding-up of insolvent Companies. This construction is supported by English decisions. See In re

Leng (2), In re Heywood (3), In re Whitaker (4), In re Webb & Co. (Smithfield) (5), affirmed by the House of Lords in Food Controller v. Cork (6).

Relying on the last mentioned case the liquidator further argued that priority as regards Crown debts should be confined to the debts mentioned in s. 230 of the Indian Companies Act. Under the English Law, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act as regards priority of Crown debts are the same as are contained in the English Companies Act of 1908, s. 209; and the difficulty which arises here from the difference between s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act and s. 230 of the Indian Companies Act does not now exist under the English Law. The ratio in Food Controller v. Cork (6) seems to be that whenever a Statute refers to the rights of the Crown the prerogative of the Crown should be confined within the limits mentioned in the Statute. Applying that principle, effect must be given to s. 229 read with s. 228 which make the provisions of s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act applicable in case of insolvent Companies. On these grounds, I am unable to accede to the argument of the liquidator, and must hold that the Crown has, in winding-up, the priority given to it under s. 49 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. There is no reason why the creditors of an insolvent Company should be in a better position as regards priority of Crown debts than the creditors of a private individual.

I, therefore, hold, that the Crown debt in this liquidation is entitled to be paid in priority. Costs of both parties to come out of assets in the hands of the liquidator: those of the liquidator to be taxed as between attorney and client. Counsel certified.

Lastly, I may add that having regard to the different and various activities of Government in this country of a commercial nature, the Legislature might well consider whether the law in India should not be brought in line with the law prevailing Inam—Service inam land—Resumption by Government—Suit by grantee for ejectment—Burden of proof of right to eject.

When the right of Government to resume an inam is questioned by a person who was not a party to the resumption proceedings, the Government or its assignees will have to substantiate the right. [p. 30, col. 2; p. 31, col. 1.]

There is no presumption that an inam grant is a grant of both the varams. A grantee who claims the right to eject, has, therefore, to prove that the kudivaram right was included in the original grant where the defendant does not admit that he came into the possession of the lands as a tenant. Second appeal against the decree of the Sub-Judge, Berhampore, in A. S. No. 62 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Aska, in O. S. No. 892 of 1920.

Mr. S. T. Srinivasagopalachariar, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. N. Rajagopala Sastri, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case so far as they are relevant to the present second appeal are very simple. The plaintiff is the proprietor of Devabhumi village. His suit is for possession of the suit lands and for arrears of rent. He alleged that the lands formed the emoluments of a barber's service inam, that the Government resumed the inam in 1916, and granted him a patta and that when the defendant refused to pay the rent demanded of him, he gave him a notice to quit and filed this suit. The defendant amongst other things contended that the suit lands did not form part of the barber's service inam and that the plaintiff had on no account any right to eject him. Various issues were raised in the case; but the main issue was "whether the plaintiff has the right to eject the defendant?"

The District Munsif found that the lands formed part of the barber's service inam and that the plaintiff proved his right to eject the defendant. His conclusion on the latter point was mainly based on the ground that in the case of inam grants, the grant was of both the varams and that the defendant had adduced no evidence to show that the inam consisted only of the melvaram right. He further supported his conclusion by referring to the fact that "the Government also appeared to have dealt with the land as inam" in its resumption proceedings. He, therefore, came to the conclusion that the Government has a right to resume the grant and give patta to the plaintiff. A decree was, therefore, given in plaintiff's favour.

In appeal the learned Subordinate Judge held that in law there is no presumption that an inam grant is a grant of both the varams, that each case has to be judged on its merits and that in this case it was not proved by the plaintiff that the original grant was by one who owned the kudivaram right and that the kudivaram right was included in the grant. He, therefore, held that the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree. The learned Subordinate Judge also held that the Government's resumption proceedings will not in any way bind the defendant. The District Munsif's decree so far as it related to the recovery of possession was, therefore, reversed.

In second appeal the plaintiff-appellant first argued that the resumption proceedings of the Government in 1916 obviously related to a resumption of both the varams and that under s. 111, Regulation VI of 1831, and the Board's Standing O. LV, cl. 3 it is not now open to the Court to re-open the question and find out the nature of the original grant. We are not satisfied that these provisions in any way support the appellant's contention. No authority has been cited in justification of the argument. The defendant was not a party to the resumption proceedings. There is nothing to show as pointed out by the learned Subordinate Judge that "either the resumption or the grant of patta was made after notice to the defendant." It appears to us that when the right of Government to resume an inam is questioned, the Government or its assignees will have to substantiate the right.

The real question for consideration is "what is the nature of the original inam grant?" Was the original grant by one who owned the kudivaram right and did the grant include the kudivaram right? According to the decisions of the Privy Council, there is no presumption that an inam grant is a grant of both the varams; each case has to be decided on its facts and merits [see Chidambara Sivaprakasa Pandara Sannadhigal v. Veerama Reddi (1)] and since the appellant claims the right to eject, he has to prove that the kudivaram right was included in the original grant. The decision in Nainapillai Marakayar v. Ramanathan Chettiar (2) is inapplicable to the present case as the defendant does not admit that he came into the possession of the lands as a tenant.

The suit lands form a pre-settlement inam. It was originally in the possession of a barber but though the lineal descendants of that barber are alive, the lands have been in the possession of the defendant and his ancestors for a very long time. The defendant had been making money payments to the plaintiff, which payments, however, do not form the basis for this suit. How the defendant or his ancestors came into possession is not explained. The only evidence with regard to the nature of the grant is the gudikat account. It does not show that land itself constituted the emoluments of the service. The learned Subordinate Judge refers to the evidence regarding the nature of the grant in para. 9 of his judgment. We agree with his conclusion based on the evidence that the plaintiff has not proved that the Government has a right to resume the land and give him a patta. The Appellate Court's decree is, therefore, right.

We may note that the respondent before us has sought to support the lower Court's decision on other grounds also relying on Ayyagari Venkata Suryanarayana v. Makka Venku Naidu (3) and the defendant's adverse possession against the plaintiff for over 12 years; but as we are of opinion that the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge, on the ground on which he has based it, is right, we did not hear his supplemental arguments. The second appeal is dismissed with costs.

LAND ACQUISITION REFERENCE NO. 4 OF 1925.

March 25, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Talyarkhan.

GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

versus

N. H. MOOS.

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), ss. 11, 23 (2)—Acquisition of toka land—Claimant, whether entitled to 15 per cent. on entire market value or only on his interest—'Market-value,' meaning of.

The expression 'market value of the land' in s. 23, sub-s. (2) of the Land Acquisition Act prima facie means the market value of all interests in the land; but in cases where Government have an interest in the land that expression must mean the claimant's interest alone, that being the only interest acquired by Government. [p. 33, col. 2.]

Where land in which Government have an interest is acquired, the fifteen per cent. awardable under s. 23 (2) of the Act should, therefore, be calculated not upon the entire market value of the land but only upon the value of the claimant's interest after deducting the amount payable to Government. [ibid.]

Government of Bombay v. Esufali (4) and Mangaldas Girdhardas v. Assistant Collector, Ahmedabad (5), applied.

FACTS.—Certain lands held on toka tenure were acquired by the Government under the Land Acquisition Act. The Land Acquisition Officer fixed the entire value of the lands at Rs. 82,000, valued the Government claim at Rs. 38,908-7-8 and, deducting the latter amount from the entire value, awarded Rs. 43,351-8-4 with 15 per cent. on the said amount, to the claimant. The claimant contended that the officer should have awarded 15 per cent. not on the value of his own interest, namely, Rs. 43,351-8-4 but on the entire value of the land, namely, Rs. 82,000. The matter was consequently referred to the Court.

JUDGMENT.—[His Lordship stated the facts and proceeded:—] In his application the claimant sets out seven grounds of objection to the award, which may be grouped together under the following heads, namely.—

(i) That Government not being a "person interested" within the meaning of s. 4 (b) of the Land Acquisition Act they are not entitled to any portion of the compensation.

(ii) That in any event the amount awarded by the Land Acquisition Officer to Government is excessive.

(iii) That the Land Acquisition Officer ought to have added 15 per cent. not merely to the balance of the compensation after deducting the amount awarded to Government, but to the aggregate compensation, namely, Rs. 82,260.

The Government claim was valued by the Land Acquisition Officer on a particular basis. After the award was made a Divisional Bench of this Court laid down in Moos v. Government of Bombay (1) the principles on which Government claim for toka should be valued. If those principles were accepted in the present case, the Government claim would be reduced from Rs. 38,508-7-8 to Rs. 29,244. Government accordingly agreed to refund the difference, namely, Rs. 9,664-7-8 to the claimant, and they refunded the same with fifteen per cent. added thereto and interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum.

At the hearing before me, Mr. Mulla for the claimant abandoned the first ground of objection. No question arises now under the second ground of objection as the parties are agreed as to the valuation of the Government claim. The only point, therefore, that remains to be considered is that raised by the third ground of objection.

To appreciate the points raised by the parties under the third ground, it is necessary to refer to certain provisions of the Land Acquisition Act.

The first section to be noted is s. 11 by which it is provided that the Collector after making the inquiry, prescribed by the section, shall make an award under his hand of—

- (i) the true area of the land;
- (ii) the compensation which in his opinion shall be allowed for the land; and
- (iii) the apportionment of the compensation among all the persons known or believed to be interested in the land...

Before passing further it may be observed that the expression "compensation" necessarily includes the value of all interests in the land for, the same has to be apportioned among all persons interested in the land. The Land Acquisition Officer, in the present case, does not state in his award the value of all interests, which is Rs. 82,260. To this extent his award does not comply with the provisions of cl. (ii). It is also to be observed, and it was conceded by the Advocate-General, that Government are not "a person interested in the land" within the meaning of s. 11 (iii).

The next section to which reference may be made is section 23. That section applies in terms to the Court; but its provisions have been made applicable to proceedings before the Land Acquisition Officer, by virtue of s. 15 of the Act. Section 23 says that:—

"In determining the amount of compensation to be awarded for land acquired under this Act, the Court shall take into consideration," six matters, being those comprised in the six clauses to that section. "The matter comprised in the first clause is 'the market value of the land.'"

Sub-clause (2) of s. 23, which is most material to the present case, is as follows:—

"In addition to the market value of the land as above provided, the Court shall in every case award a sum of fifteen per centum on such market value, in consideration of the compulsory nature of the acquisition."

Pausing here for a moment it may be observed that the compensation to be awarded under s. 23 (1) may be the market value only or that it may consist of the market value and the remaining five items or some or one of them. The fifteen per centum provided for in s. 23 (2) has to be added only to the market value and not to any other item. Moreover, it has to be added to the market value of "the land" and the whole question in this case is what is meant by the expression "the land" in ss. 23 (2).

It has been contended by the claimant that the words "the land" mean the market value of all interests in the land under acquisition which, he says, in the present case, is Rs. 82,260, and that the Land Acquisition Officer ought to have added the fifteen per cent. in the first instance to Rs. 82,260, that he should have then deducted Rs. 29,244 being the amount of the Government claim from Rs. 82,260+15 per cent., and awarded the balance to the claimant. The first because this contention is borne out by the decisions in Collector of Belgaum v. Bhimrao (2) and Trustees for the Improvement of the City of Bombay v. Jalbhoy Ardesir Sett (3) which were cited for the claimant.

The answer given to this by the Advocate-General on behalf of Government, is, first, that in cases where Government have an interest in the land under acquisition, the words "the land" mean the claimant's interest alone in the land, and, secondly, that if the claimant's arguments were to be accepted by the Court, the claimant would be receiving 15 per cent. on the amount of the Government claim,—a result which on the face of it is inequitable. In support of the first branch of the argument reliance was placed on a ruling of a Divisional Bench of this Court in Government of Bombay v. Esufali (4). In that case the relation between Government and the claimant was that of landlord and tenant and the question for the determination of the Court was whether Government were entitled to any portion of the compensation. It was held by Macleod, J., that they were not. But the decision was reversed in appeal. In the course of his judgment Batchelor, J., observed as follows (page 51*):—

"In Trustees for the Improvement of the City of Bombay v. Jalbhoy Ardesir Sett (3), following Collector of Belgaum v. Bhimrao (2), I expressed the opinion that the Act contemplates an inquiry to ascertain the value of the land itself considered as if all interests combined to sell; and I see no reason at present to alter that opinion as to the general scheme of the Act. It is, however, admitted that the point now before us was not decided in Jalbhoy's case (3), but is res integra for our decision now.....But... there is nothing in the Act which excludes from its operation cases where Government hold some interest in the land to be acquired."

The case was remanded to the trial Judge for the determination of the following issues:—

(i) At the material time what interest had the respondent (claimant) in the land (apart from the building itself)?

(ii) To what compensation is he entitled in respect of that interest?

This decision is an authority for the proposition that where Government have some interest in the land to be acquired, all that the claimant is entitled to is the value of his interest in the land, and it is this value alone that has to be determined by the Court. This case was followed in Mangaldas Girdhardas v. Assistant Collector, Ahmedabad (5) and the ruling was accepted by Macleod, C. J., in Moos v. Government of Bombay (1) cited above.

It was pointed out by Mr. Mulla for the claimant that both in Esufali's case (4) and Mangaldas' case (5) the relation between Government and the claimant was that of landlord and tenant, while in the present case Government claimed no proprietary interest in the land under reference, but had only a right to levy toka assessment, with the additional right to increase the assessment in 1929-30. But in Moos's case (1) also the only claim of Government was for toka assessment, as in the present case, and Macleod, C. J., accepted the principle of the decision in Esufali's case (4) though it was a reversal of his own judgment delivered while he was a puisne Judge.

I think that prima facie the expression "market value of the land" in s. 23 (2) means the market value of all interests in the land. But in cases where Government have an interest in the land, that expression must mean claimant's interest alone, that interest being the only interest that is acquired by Government. In the present case, Government have admittedly an interest in the land, though it is an interest limited to their toka claim. The Land Acquisition Officer, it seems, followed the decision in Esufali's case (4) and he determined the market value of the claimant's interest alone and added fifteen per cent. to it.

As regards the contention that it would be inequitable if the claimant were to get 15 per cent. on the amount of the Government claim, I think that the Court has to determine the meaning of the section in question, and if the plain meaning of the section involved such a result, the Court must give effect to it, leaving it to the Legislature to remedy the defect. In the present case, however, the question of inequity does not arise in view of the interpretation I put upon this section.

The reference must, therefore, be dismissed.

As regards costs, it is to be observed that after the reference was filed, Government paid to the claimant Rs. 11,114-3-8 in all, thus admitting the validity of the claimant's objection that the amount awarded by the Land Acquisition Officer to Government was too much. At the same time the only point argued before me was as to the 15 per cent. and on this Government have succeeded.

The order for costs, therefore, will be—

(i) Government to pay claimant's costs of the correspondence between the parties from July 18, 1925, to May 4, 1926, including the correspondence between the claimant's attorneys and the claimant's engineers between those dates in connection with the toka claim of Government.

(ii) Claimant to pay cost of Government up to July 8, 1925, and also costs of Government after May 4, 1926, up to February 27, 1927, including costs of all postponements.

(iii) As to costs after February 27, 1927, up to and including to-day, each party to bear his own.

(iv) Claimant to pay costs of Government after to-day.

—RESPONDENT.

Provincial Insolvency Act (V of 1920), s. 74 (ii)—Summary administration of insolvent's estate—Appointment of interim Receiver, effect of—Purchaser in execution sale, rights of.

When summary administration of the estate of a debtor has been ordered the property of the debtor under s. 74 (ii) of the Provincial Insolvency Act vests in the Court as a Receiver on the date of admission of the insolvency petition, in the sense in which the term is used in s. 28 (2) and not merely as an interim Receiver, and when the property is so vested it cannot, without the permission of the Court, be the subject of an execution sale.

But if property which has so vested in the Court is sold in execution without the permission of the Court, a purchaser who has bought in good faith is entitled to retain the property, and the creditors of the insolvent are entitled only to the sale-proceeds of the property as assets for distribution among them.

Petition under s. 75, cl. 1 of Act V of 1920, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Court, East Tanjore at Negapatam, in C. M. A. No. 73 of 1926, preferred against that of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Negapatam, in E. A. No. 278 of 1926, in S. O. S. No. 2025 of 1921.

Mr. S. T. Srinivasagopalachariar, for the Petitioners.

Mr. K. S. Desikan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Second petitioner seeks to have revised an order of the District Judge, Negapatam, setting aside a Court execution sale at which the second petitioner was the Court auction-purchaser. The date of sale was 16th April, 1926. On 7th April, 1926, the judgment-debtor had presented an insolvency petition to the District Munsif of Negapatam. The District Munsif passed an order on that petition which has occasioned a good deal of confusion. He appointed the Official Receiver an interim Receiver and directed that the property vest in him and then went on to say "summary administration has been ordered." Now, when summary administration has been ordered, the property of the debtor under s. 74 (ii) vests in the Court as a Receiver on the date of admission of the insolvency petition. Hence the appointment of an interim Receiver was not only superfluous but also misleading. The property had already vested in the Court "as a Receiver" and the Court, therefore, was the Receiver. It is contended by the petitioner that as only an interim Receiver had been appointed the vesting of the property in him could not avail to defeat the execution sale, and that s. 74 (ii) means no more than that the Court holds the property as an interim Receiver. I am not able to endorse this view. The language of s. 74 (ii) is almost the same as that of s. 28 (2) and the words "vesting" and "Receiver" must be interpreted in the same way in both sections; no one has contended that when the vesting in the Receiver within s. 28 (2) has come into force, the property is so vested that it can, without the permission of the Court, be the subject of an execution sale. Similarly under s. 74 (ii) I take it that when the property is vested in the Court as a Receiver, it holds it, not as interim Receiver, but as a full Receiver in the sense in which the term is used in s. 28 (2). It follows then that on the admission of the insolvency petition (the Court held the judgment-debtor's property as a Receiver and was so holding it when the execution sale took place.

So far I do not disagree with the learned District Judge. But he has omitted to consider the provisions of s. 51 of the Act, especially sub-s. (3). As I read that section, if the petitioner was a Court-auction-purchaser in good faith, he is entitled to retain the property and the creditors of the insolvent are entitled only to the sale-proceeds of the property as assets for distribution among them, i. e., the sale would not be set aside but would prevail against the Receiver, and the property could not be returned to the Receiver, as the lower Court has ordered. The lower Court has, therefore, omitted to apply the proper law to the case and it will, therefore, have to go into this question and decide whether s. 51 (3) applies to the case.

I set aside its order and direct that it re-hear the appeal, both parties being allowed to adduce evidence. Costs in this Court and below will abide the event.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 120—Money advanced for purchase of horse—Agent buying mare—Sale of mare by agent—Right of lender to follow proceeds in the hands of agent—Limitation.

A advanced money to S to buy him a horse. S bought a mare which A refused to take. S retained the mare and agreed to return the amount on selling the mare. S then sold the mare, whereupon A sued for recovery of the loan more than three years after the date of the loan.

Held, that A had an equitable right to follow the proceeds in the hands of S who was merely an agent and the suit being governed by Art. 120 of the first Schedule to the Limitation Act was within time.

Revision against a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Sitapur, dated the 26th May, 1927.

Mr. M. Ayub, for the Applicant.

Mr. S. M. Ahmad, for the Opposite-Party.

JUDGMENT.—The facts are as follows. Darogha Azam Ali asserts that he advanced Rs. 160 to Shamsheer Ali in order that Shamsheer Ali might purchase for him a horse of a price up to this amount. The money was advanced on the 25th December, 1923. Shamsheer Ali is alleged to have purchased a mare of this value. Darogha Azam Ali is alleged to have refused to accept the mare stating that he wanted a horse. It is alleged that Shamsheer Ali retained the mare and agreed to return the Rs. 160 and he is alleged to have sold the mare in May, 1924. The suit was brought on the 25th February, 1927. The learned Small Cause Court Judge has dismissed the suit holding that it was barred by limitation. I cannot agree with the learned Small Cause Court Judge on this point. It appears to me that this is clearly a case in which Shamsheer Ali is alleged to have sold goods as an agent entrusted to him by his principal Darogha Azam Ali and is alleged to have retained the proceeds which the principal had an equitable right to follow in his hands. The period of limitation applicable would thus be according to the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Gurudas Pyne v. Ram Narain Sahu (1) a period of six years. The present Article of Limitation applicable would be Art. 120 of the First Schedule of Act IX of 1908. I hold that if it be proved that Azam Ali advanced Rs. 160 to Shamsheer Ali with which to purchase a horse, that Shamsheer Ali sold the mare in May, 1924, the suit is within time. I decide nothing more. I accordingly remit the suit to the learned Small Cause Court Judge in question for re-admission on its previous number and decision on the merits. Costs of this application will follow the result.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

INSOLVENCY PETITION No. 262-A OF 1927.

March 8, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Talyarkhan.

In re HYDERBHAI HUSSEINBHAI.

Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (III of 1909), ss. 9 (e), 12 (c)—Attachment for over twenty-one days—Act of insolvency—Application for adjudication—Limitation—Three months, when begin to run—Continuing attachment, whether gives continuing cause of action.

Under s. 9 (e) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, the act of insolvency is committed immediately on the expiry of the definitely fixed period of twenty-one days and there is no recurring or continuing act of insolvency where the attachment is continued for more than twenty-one days. [p. 33, col. 1.]

The period of three months within which a petition for adjudication on the basis of such an act of insolvency should be presented, by a creditor under s. 12 (c) of the Act, therefore, begins to run from the date of the expiry of the twenty-one days even though the attachment is continued for more than twenty-one days. Petition for adjudication.

Mr. Daphtary, for the Creditors.

Mr. Taraporewala, for the Debtor.

JUDGMENT.—This is a creditors' petition praying that Hyderbhai Husseinbhai who is alleged to be indebted to the several petitioners in the various sums set out in the petition, may be adjudicated insolvent. The act of insolvency alleged against the debtor is, that the property of the debtor consisting of the decree of the Bombay High Court passed in his favour in Suit No. 3668 of 1922 against one Ebrahim Ismail and others has been attached for a period of not less than twenty-one days in execution of a decree of this Court in Suit No. 383 of 1926 against the debtor. It is stated in the affidavit in support of the petition that the attachment was levied on or about March 23, 1926, and that the attachment is still subsisting. The petitioners contend that on these facts, which are not disputed, the debtor is guilty of an act of insolvency mentioned in s. 9 (e) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, and is liable to be adjudicated insolvent on his creditors' petition.

Section 9 (e) provides that a debtor commits an act of insolvency "if any of his property has been sold or attached for a period of not less than twenty-one days in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money."

It is clear that in this case the debtor committed an act of insolvency for he allowed his property to remain under attachment for a period of not less than twenty-one days.

But Mr. Taraporewala for the debtor has argued that the petition does not comply with the requirements of s. 12 (1) (c) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, which provides that "A creditor shall not be entitled to present an insolvency petition against a debtor unless—(c) the act of insolvency on which the petition is grounded has occurred within three months before the presentation of the petition."

It is argued that the attachment having been levied on March, 23, 1926, the act of insolvency was committed twenty-one days thereafter, that is, on April, 13, 1926, and the petition having been presented in February, 1927, the act of insolvency did not occur within three months from the date of the petition—it occurred ten months before that date—and that, therefore, under s. 12 (c) the petition cannot be entertained.

The decision on this point depends on the question whether the act of insolvency is completed once for all after twenty-one days after the attachment, or whether it is a succession of acts of insolvency after each successive period of twenty-one days during which the attachment continues, or whether the continued attachment for more than twenty-one days is a continuing act of insolvency.

The point raised by Mr Taraporewala is important both from the point of view of the insolvent and the creditors, and I find that it is not covered by any reported decisions of the Indian High Courts. It is, therefore, necessary to look to the English decisions under the Bankruptcy Act to see how a similar provision in the English Act has been construed by the English Courts, especially as the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is based principally on the English Bankruptcy Act. In the case of In re Beeston (1) exactly the same question arose under s. 1 of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Section 1 of that Act, which was similar to s. 1 (e) of the Bankruptcy Act of 1914, provided that "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if execution against him has been levied by seizure of his goods under process in an action in any Court or in any civil proceeding in the High Court, and the goods have been either sold or held by the Sheriff for twenty-one days."

In that case the Sheriff took possession in July, 1896, and the receiving order was not made until October, 1897. It was contended that the continued possession of the Sheriff for more than twenty-one days was a continued act of bankruptcy or may be a succession of acts of bankruptcy. But that argument was not upheld, and the Court of Appeal held that his subsequent continuing in possession by the Sheriff under the same seizure did not constitute a further or continuing act of bankruptcy, and that consequently there was no act of bankruptcy under the section available against the debtor. Mr. Taraporewala has relied on that case in support of his contention.

Mr. Daphtary for the petitioning creditors argued that In re Beeston (1) was not applicable as the wording of the English Act was different from that of the Indian Act inasmuch as in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy, the former Act contemplates holding by the Sheriff "for twenty-one days," whereas under s. 9 (e) the attachment is to be for a period of "not less than twenty-one days," and that, therefore, under the Indian Act, the act of insolvency is a continuing act. I confess I do not see any distinction between the wording of the Indian and English Acts respectively, for the expression "not less than twenty-one days" in plain English can mean nothing but for twenty-one days and not less, exactly as it is in the English Act. Therefore, twenty-one days is the period for which the property must remain attached under the Indian Act, twenty-one days is the period for which the property must be held by the Sheriff under the English Act, in order to constitute this particular act of insolvency. That being so, the decision in In re Beeston (1) is, in my opinion, a decision in point in construing s. 9 (e) to see whether such an act of insolvency is a recurring or continuing act. In his judgment in that case, Lindley, M. R., says (page 631*):—

"Now I will read the two sections which are important. The first is s. 1 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890, which would avail the trustee if you could read it so as to make the act of bankruptcy come down to October, 1897, or within three months of it. But the dates are important. The fi. fa. was executed and the Sheriff took possession in July, 1896 and twenty-one days after that would expire on August 17, 1896, and the receiving order, the title of the trustee, did not occur until October 1897. (The learned Judge read s. 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890) Now, is it possible to fairly construe that section so as to make continued possession for more than twenty-one days either a continued act of bankruptcy, or, if it should be a succession of periods of twenty-one days, a succession of acts of bankruptcy? I do not think that is consistent with the language. We know perfectly well that acts of bankruptcy have to be regarded critically and carefully. There is no such thing as an act of bankruptcy except that which the Statute declares to be one, and when the Statute says an act of bankruptcy is committed if an execution has been levied by seizure and the goods have been held by the Sheriff for twenty-one days, that means that the seizure and holding for twenty-one days together are essential for the consideration of whether there is an act of bankruptcy or not. It seems to me it would be straining this section beyond all reason to say that there was a succession of acts of bankruptcy at the expiration of every period of twenty-one days, or that there has been one continued act of bankruptcy running over a year and a half. That appears to me to be the true construction of the section."

Rigby, L. J., and Vaughan Williams, L. J., concurred in this view of the law.

Having regard to the similarity between the Indian and English sections, in fact they are identically the same as pointed out above. I think that the view of the law taken in In re Beeston (1) is the correct view to take in construing s. 9 (e) of the Indian Act, and that is clear if we look to the reason of the rule as regards the period of twenty-one days. The reason appears to be that, if a debtor is unable to satisfy a decree against him, and his property is attached in execution, it shows, prima facie, that he is not in a position to pay his debts, and, therefore, is liable to be adjudged an insolvent in order that his property may be distributed rateably amongst his creditors. But the Legislature provides that a certain period, after attachment, should be given to the debtor as an allowance made to him in order to enable him to pay off the debt and redeem both his property and his character, and that period is fixed both in India and England at twenty-one days. It is then provided that if the debtor fails to do so within that period, he will be held to have committed an act of insolvency. It is, therefore, clear that the act of insolvency is committed immediately on the expiry of the definitely fixed period of twenty one days; and just as the English section does not say that this becomes a recurring or a continuing act of insolvency if the attachment continues for more than twenty-one days, equally so there is nothing in the Indian section to that effect. It is, therefore, clear that the Legislature intended the act of insolvency to be one act committed on the expiry of twenty-one days after the attachment, and if this is not availed of by the creditor within the time fixed by s. 12 (c) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act his right to proceed against the debtor in insolvency would arise only under a fresh attachment.

Adopting, therefore, the reasoning in the case of In re Beeston (1), I hold that under s. 9 (e) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act the attachment for more than twenty-one days is not a continuing act of insolvency, nor is there a repetition of the act of insolvency at the expiration of every period of twenty-one days, and that the act of insolvency contemplated is committed on the completion of the first twenty-one days.

That being so, it only remains to be ascertained whether this act of insolvency on which the present petition is grounded, "has occurred within three months before the presentation of the petition," as required by s. 12 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. In reckoning the twenty-one days, the day on which the attachment is levied is not to be computed: see In re Noth, Ex parte Hasluck (2). Therefore, the act of insolvency in the present case was committed on April 13, 1926, but the petition is not presented till February 22, 1927, therefore, the act of insolvency did not occur within three months before the date of the petition and, therefore, under s. 12 (c) the petition cannot be entertained.

I, therefore, dismiss the petition with costs.

Usurious Loans Act (X of 1918), s. 3, applicability of —Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 74—Agreement to pay enhanced compound interest on default, whether penal.

The Usurious Loans Act can have no application to a mortgage executed in 1911, long before it was enacted. [p. 39, col. 1.]

An agreement to pay compound interest at an enhanced rate on default of regular payment is penal. [p. 39, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decree of the First Sub-Judge, First Class, Nagpur, dated the 30th October, 1926, in Civil Suit No. 21 of 1924.

Mr. M. R. Bobde, for the Appellant.

Messrs. M. R. Indurkar, M. B. Bhawalkar and W. B. Puranik, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—I am only concerned with the question of allowance or disallowance of interest in the present case. The mortgage-deed in suit for Rs. 3,500 was executed on 30th November, 1911. The consideration was wanted for the following purposes. The mortgagors had to pay a decree for Rs. 3,014 odd outstanding in favour of another creditor; to the mortgagee also a decree for Rs. 333 odd was due and the small balance of consideration was apparently taken in cash. The first instalment was to be paid on a fixed date about 13 months later, and thereafter the remaining six instalments were to be paid year by year at the same time. With each instalment the interest then due at 1 per cent. per mensem was also to be paid. If each of the said instalment and interest were not paid, an enhanced rate of Rs. 1-4 compound interest was to be chargeable. The mortgage-bond in suit also contained the following two clauses:—

"(a) If owing to our not having paid the kist of Government demand, you are required to pay that amount, this (sic) may be treated as foreclosed before the stipulated period, and you may take possession."

"(b) If two of the instalments agreed by us for satisfaction of the said amount are defaulted by us, we will pay the en-ture amount together with interest in a lump."

Such are the essential terms of the mortgage-deed (p-1).

The following payments have admittedly been made:—

Rs. 1,600	...	on 2nd April, 1915.
" 850	...	on 29th June, 1917.

In other words, within less than six years of the date of execution of the mortgage, an amount equivalent to practically the whole principal, except Rs. 50, had been paid. In spite of this, the present suit was brought for an amount of Rs. 5,784 4 on the basis of compound interest at Re. 1 per cent. per mensem being claimed instead of the enhanced rate of Rs. 1-4 per cent. per mensem.

The Subordinate Judge held that the conditions referred to above of the mortgage were not penal, particularly having regard to the fact that the plaintiff had charged only compound interest at Re. 1 per cent. per mensem. He, however, held that the case was one which was covered by the Usurious Loans Act of 1918, and he accordingly re-opened the transaction and allowed simple interest at Rs. 1-4 per cent. per mensem. On this basis, the lower Court awarded the plaintiff-appellant a decree for Rs. 3,851-6-0.

The plaintiff has now come up on appeal claiming that interest should have been allowed at the compound rate of 1 per cent. per mensem, and a total of Rs. 5,784-4 0 is accordingly claimed as having been due on the date of the suit.

The Pleaders for the respondents have admitted that the Usurious Loans Act as such could have no application to the present mortgage which was executed in 1911, and it is difficult to understand how an experienced Judge like the Judge of the lower Court held that it could apply. It has, however, been urged on behalf of the respondents that, in any event, the provisions of the mortgage as to payment of compound interest at an enhanced rate were penal and that it was open to this Court to allow a reasonable compensation under s. 74 of the Contract Act, entirely irrespective of the fact that the plaintiff has only claimed compound interest at the original rate of Re. 1 per cent. per mensem.

On behalf of the appellants it has been urged that the provision as to interest was not penal and I have been referred in this connection to the old decision of this Court in Jagmohan v. Tikaitrai (1) wherein Neill, J. O., held that a stipulation that compound interest shall be paid on interest not paid up is not a penalty. The same view was taken in Bhagwant Atmaram v. Ganpati Chowdhari Kunbi (2) by Ismay, J. O. It has been suggested that it is erroneous to look at the present mortgage-deed as one which initially provided for simple interest and it has been pointed out that the question of compound interest did not arise unless and until the first or any other instalment was defaulted. That is, no doubt, perfectly true, but the fact remains that, if payments had been made regularly year by year, as provided for in the bond, the interest payable by the mortgagors was only simple interest at 1 per cent. per mensem. The indubitable fact, therefore, remains that, in case of default, compound interest at an enhanced rate of Rs. 1-4 per cent. per mensem was to be chargeable. It seems to me, therefore, that the Subordinate Judge was clearly wrong in holding that the conditions as to interest were not penal.

Although the facts of the case in Purshottam v. Sahu (3) were wholly different from those of the present case, yet the principles laid down in that case seem to me fully applicable in the present one also. Here we find only a provision for compound as opposed to simple interest and that at an enhanced rate, but we have also a condition of exigibility of the whole amount, if apparently any two of the instalments are defaulted. It is not even clear from the bond whether such default must be in any two instalments or any two consecutive instalments, but the point is immaterial for the purpose of the present appeal. Holding, therefore, as I do, that the provisions as to interest were penal, it seems to me that it is the duty of the Court, on the principles laid down in Purshottam v. Sahu (3) to decide what reasonable compensation should be awarded to the plaintiff, and the mere fact that the latter has himself deemed it advisable to only claim compound interest at the lesser rate of Rs. 1 per cent. per mensem, does not necessarily, in my opinion, preclude this Court from even granting a lower rate than that.

It has been urged on behalf of the respondents that the case, from the mortgagors' point of view, is a very hard one. Although practically all the principal was paid off within six years of the date of the execution of the mortgage deed, in suit, the amount now claimed has accumulated to the already stated large sum of Rs. 5,784-4-0. That is, no doubt, true, but the fact remains that in the case of a mortgage like the present, the respondents had it in their own hands all through to clear off what would have been, in reality, a petty sum as compared with the amount now claimed from them. Action under s. 60 of the Transfer of Property Act was always open to the mortgagors in this connection. It is doubtless a common custom amongst creditors and mortgagees in this country to wait until the last moment, or anyhow for an unduly long time before coming to Court on a mortgage like the present, and the practice may be reprehensible from a moral point of view, and, in my opinion, is. The fact, however, remains that, from the legal point of view, the mortgagor, if he is able and really anxious, so to speak, to force the hands of the mortgagee, has the remedy in his own hands as pointed out above, and he can thus defeat the policy of any mortgagee who deliberately delays bringing his suit on the mortgage.

In this aspect of the case, it seems, to me that I would not be justified in refusing the mortgagee's claim for compound interest at the original rate of Re. 1 per cent. per mensem. It seems to me that neither from the legal nor the equitable point of view, this relief cannot be refused to the appellant (mortgagee). The lower Court allowed interest at this rate up to 30th April, 1927, the date which was fixed for payment. I do not think that, in view of the circumstances of this case and of the large amount of interest which I feel myself bound to allow to the plaintiff, any further interest should be granted. A decree will, therefore, be made of the amount due up to 30th April, 1927, on the basis of a compound rate of interest at Re. 1 per cent. per mensem, and the amount so due will be substituted for the amount of Rs. 4,244-5-6 found due in the lower Court's decree. The defendants-respondents must also bear the plaintiff-appellant's costs in both Courts.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Appellants.

Mr. Mehr Chand Mahajan, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff firm, which carries on a commission agency business, sued the defendant firm for the recovery of Rs. 1,000. According to the plaint the defendant firm dealt with the plaintiff firm, receiving goods worth Rs. 7,016 6, there being an agreement to pay interest at 12 per cent. per annum, this interest being also chargeable according to custom. It was stated further that the defendant firm paid Rs. 6,290-10-9 so that the balance due was Rs. 725-11-3. Interest was added to this sum so as to bring the amount up to Rs. 1,000. This suit was dismissed by the trial Court on the ground that Art. 83 of the Limitation Act applied and the suit was accordingly barred by limitation. On appeal the learned District Judge held that the plaint showed that there was an open, current account between the parties, leaving a certain amount unpaid by the defendant firm. In his opinion Art. 85 applied and the suit was within time. The appeal was, therefore, accepted by him and the suit was remanded to the trial Court for disposal on the merits. Against this decision this second appeal has been preferred.

At the time of issues a member of the plaintiff firm stated that the defendant firm bought through his firm 200 tins of oil and that what remained due was for the loss in that transaction together with other incidental expenses of that transaction. This shows that all the transactions of the commission agency between the parties were settled except the one in question. The oil referred to was bought by the plaintiff firm as agents of the defendant firm on the 9th December, 1920, and the price was paid by the plaintiff firm on the same date. The oil was sold on the 16th of February, 1922, and the amount on account of loss was debited that day. The present suit was brought on the 5th May, 1925. Further the issues framed show that all that the parties went to trial upon was the question of loss incurred in this oil transaction and the other charges connected therewith. It might also be mentioned that a member of the plaintiff firm as a witness admitted that all dealings were with the plaintiff firm in their capacity as commission agents working on behalf of the defendant firm.

It was held in Manghi Ram v. Firm of Saran Das Maman Chand (1), Sarab Dial-Ishar Dass v. Devi Ditta Mal Gordhan Das (2) Kadari Pershad Chhedi Lal v. Har Bhagwan (3) Munshi Ram v. Bhagwan Das (4) and Devisahai Ramji Das v. Tirath Ram (5) that where a commission agent buys goods for a principal and they are re-sold by the agent at a loss, a suit by the agent to recover the amount of the said loss with interest and other incidental expenses must be brought within the period of limitation prescribed by Art. 83 of Sch. I to the Limitation Act. Limitation in such a case operates from the date of payment made on behalf of the principal and not from the date of the sale. In the present case, therefore, limitation commenced on the 9th December, 1920. Under Art. 83 the period of limitation is three years from the date when the plaintiff was actually damnified. The suit having been brought in 1925 is thus apparently long barred by limitation as the plaintiff was damnified in connection with the transaction in question in 1920 when the plaintiff firm paid for the oil on behalf of the defendant firm.

It was argued, however, on behalf of the respondent firm that as according to the plaint the relief claimed was not for indemnity of loss but for the balance in a running account it was not permissible to go behind the plaint and discover what was the real matter in suit between the parties. This proposition as stated is much too wide and it cannot be admitted that a plaintiff by clever wording of his plaint can avoid the proper limitation for his suit. It was more or less admitted that if there had been only a single transaction of buying and selling by the plaintiff firm on behalf of the defendant firm Art. 83 would have applied, but that as there were several transactions all embodied in one account which for this reason showed sometimes a credit in favour of one party and sometimes a credit in favour of the other, the account must be taken to have been a mutual, open and current one with reciprocal demands between the parties. I cannot accept this argument that the mere accident that there were several transactions makes the account different in any way. The account remains that of a commission agent and his principal each transaction giving rise either to loss or profit in favour of one party or the other.

I was referred to Namberumal Chetty v. Kotayya (6). In that case the plaintiff advanced moneys to the defendant and the latter consigned goods to the former for sale on commission. It was held that there were independent obligations on each side and that the account between the parties was a mutual, open and current one within the meaning of Art. 85. In the present case the defendant firm was buying through the plaintiff firm as their agents and selling through them. The plaintiff firm was not advancing money to the defendant firm, nor was the latter consigning goods to the former for sale on commission. There were thus no independent obligations on each side and the ruling does not apply.

The other two rulings referred to, namely, Bihari Lal Jai Narain v. Har Narain Das (7) and Ratan Chand-Jwala Das v. Asa Singh-Bagha Singh (8) are distinguishable for the same reason. Nor can it be said that there was an understanding that the plaintiff firm was to keep an open, mutual and current account because by the nature of the dealings the balance of account went from one side to the other. That is the natural result which follows from commission agency transactions of the kind in question in this suit.

For the reasons given above, I am of opinion that the suit is barred by Art. 83 and accepting the appeal, I set aside the order of the learned District Judge and restore that of the trial Judge dismissing the suit with costs throughout.

B—Non-delivery of goods—Suit for damages—Burden* of proof of negligence—Duty of Railway Company to produce their servants for examination, whether confined to Small Cause suits.

Per Blackwell, J.—Apart from suits in a Small Cause Court whatever may be the moral obligation upon a Railway Company to render facilities in discovering how goods entrusted to them under a special contract, and not as bailees, may have disappeared, there is no legal obligation upon them to call any evidence to show by examination-in-chief how a loss occurred, or to enable a plaintiff by cross-examination to prove this if he can. [p. 43, col. 2.]

Per Jhaveri, J.—In a suit against a Railway Company for non-delivery of goods consigned under Risk Note Form B the Railway Company should produce before the Court for examination those of their servants who were in a position to be acquainted with the facts relating to the disappearance of the goods. This rule is not confined to suits in Small Cause Courts but applies to all the Courts in the country. [p. 44, col. 2.]

Second appeal from a decision of the Assistant Judge at Ahmedabad, in Appeal No. 116 of 1924, confirming that of the Joint Subordinate Judge at Ahmedabad, in Civil Suit No. 460 of 1920.

JUDGMENT.

Blackwell, J.—This is an appeal by the 3rd defendant Company from a decision of the Assistant Judge of Ahmedabad dismissing an appeal from the Subordinate Judge at Ahmedabad. The facts in the case may be stated very shortly and are not really in dispute. They are as follows:—On June 30, 1921, the plaintiffs delivered 87 bales of piece goods at Ahmedabad to the 1st defendants, the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company, for carriage to Sealdah. The goods were consigned under what is known as Risk Note B to which I will presently refer. They were loaded in a waggon No. 32,700 belonging to the 3rd defendants, the East Indian Railway Company, who are the present appellants. The goods were carried from Ahmedabad to Agra by the 1st defendant Company, and thence over the 3rd defendant Company's line, via, Asansol to Sealdah. They arrived at Sealdah on August 9, 1921, and upon examination it was found that there were 85 bales intact, that one bale was entirely missing, and that there was the outer covering of another with one bundle in it.

Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs sued the 1st defendant Company, the 2nd defendant Company who were subsequently struck off, and the 3rd defendant Company for damages for the loss of two bales, alleging in their plaint that they had not been delivered by reason of carelessness, indifference, and want of proper care on the part of the defendant Companies. The only written statement to which it is now necessary to refer is that of the 3rd defendant Company in which, in substance, they deny negligence, rely upon the terms of the special contract contained in the Risk Note, and put the plaintiffs to the proof of any exceptional circumstances which would entitle them to recover having regard to the terms of that Risk Note.

Several issues were raised in the case, but Mr. Coyajee, who appeared for the appellants informed the Court that the only issues material for the purposes of the present appeal were issues Nos. 2, 5 and 7. Those issues are in the following terms:—(2) "Are the defendant Companies absolved from all liability whatsoever for the suit consignment because it was booked under Risk Note Form B?" The answer to that issue given by the learned Subordinate Judge was "No." The 5th issue was: "Is it proved by the defendant Companies that they took as much care of the suit consignment as persons of ordinary prudence would do?" The answer to that issue was "No." And the 7th issue was: "Was the loss due to the wilful neglect of the Railway servants? The answer to that issue was "Yes."

The material terms of the Risk Note are in substance that the consignors agree and undertake to hold the defendants harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss from any cause whatever "except for the loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages forming part of a consignment due either to the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration, or to theft by, or to the wilful neglect of, its servants, transport agents, or carriers employed by them."

The law governing a case of this character is now to be found in a decision of G. I. P. Ry. v. Himatlal Jagjivandas (1). In that case the learned Chief Justice Sir Norman Macleod referred to a decision of the House of Lords in Smith Ltd. v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2). In that case the defendants at the trial called no evidence, but contended that the plaintiffs had failed to establish any case of wilful misconduct against them, and it was held that the refusal of the defendants to account for the loss of the goods was not evidence which justified the Court in inferring that the loss arose from the wilful misconduct of the defendants' servants. In the case of G. I. P. Ry. v. Himatlal Jagjivandas (1) the learned Chief Justice said at page 353*—"It appears, therefore, that although it may be said that in equity the Railway Company ought to give such information to their customers as is in their possession with regard to the loss of goods delivered to them, it is not incumbent under the law upon them to do, and they are not obliged to go out of their way to assist a plaintiff in proving wilful neglect." In my opinion, it is plain from this decision that, apart from suits in a Small Cause Court to which I will presently refer, whatever may be the moral obligation upon a Railway Company to render facilities in discovering how goods entrusted to them under a special contract, and not as bailees, may have disappeared, there is no legal obligation upon them to call any evidence to show by examination-in-chief how a loss occurred, or to enable a plaintiff by cross-examination to prove this if he can. It may, of course, be possible for a plaintiff by administering interrogatories to compel admissions from the Railway Company as to how the goods have been lost. It is also, of course, incumbent upon the Railway Company to disclose in its affidavit of document all material documents in its possession, and if any of those documents enable a plaintiff to show how the goods have disappeared, he may in that way be able to discharge the burden which is in the first instance upon him. But except in a Small Cause Court I am satisfied that there is in such cases as the present, no legal obligation upon a defendant to call evidence unless he chooses to do so. The position is different in a Small Cause Court having regard to what the learned Chief Justice said in the case to which I have referred [G. I. P. Ry. v. Himatlal Jagjivandas (1)], namely, that "as there are no rules of procedure enabling a party to administer interrogatories in a Small Cause Court suit we still think that in this country a Railway Company should produce before the Court for examination those of their servants who were in a position to be acquainted with the facts relating to the disappearance of their customer's goods." In view of what the learned Chief Justice had said earlier in the case, namely, that it is not incumbent under the law upon a Railway Company to give such information to their customers as is in their possession with regard to the loss of goods delivered to them, and that they are not obliged to go out of their way to assist the plaintiff in proving wilful neglect, it seems to me plain that his remarks as to a Railway Company producing for examination before the Court such of their servants as are acquainted with the facts apply only to a suit in a Small Cause Court. Accordingly, in my judgment, the head-note in the case, para. 2 following upon the word "Held," does not correctly represent the actual decision.

This being in my view the law applicable to a case of this kind, what are the proved facts in this case? The plaintiffs called only one witness, their manager. He said this: "The fact that we got two bales short is the neglect of the Railway. I cannot show any other neglect of the Railway Administration. I have no evidence for negligence, carelessness, indifference except the fact of short delivery by two bales." That was the only evidence adduced by the plaintiffs. Under the terms of the Risk Note, to enable them to succeed, it was incumbent upon them to adduce some evidence to show that the loss was due either to the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration, or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants. It is plain that on the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs themselves, they had not discharged the burden, and in my opinion, if the defendants had submitted at the close of the plaintiffs' case that the plaintiffs had failed to make out any case against them, they would have been entitled to succeed. But in this case the 3rd defendants took upon themselves to call evidence.....

In the result, for the reason I have given, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs by cross-examination of a witness tendered by the defendants discharged the prima facie burden which was upon them, and afforded evidence from which the inference drawn by the learned Assistant Judge was amply justified. That evidence was not rebutted by the 3rd defendant Company.

In the circumstances, I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Jhaveri, J.—I agree in the order of dismissal of this second appeal with costs. The facts and the law of the case have been exhaustively dealt with by my learned senior brother.

Where I differ from him is in the interpretation of the decision in G. I. P. Ry. v. Himatlal Jagjivandas (i). No doubt, the House of Lords' case is to the effect as has been set out by my learned brother. The judgment of the learned Chief Justice Sir Norman Macleod, however, so far as our Courts are concerned, seems to me to have slightly modified the view taken in England, and for this observation, I rely on this passage of the judgment of the learned Chief Justice at page 354* :—"But as there are no rules of procedure enabling a party to administer interrogatories in a Small Cause Court suit we still think that in this country a Railway Company should produce before the Court for examination those of their servants who were in a position to be acquainted with the facts relating to the disappearance of their customer's goods." This passage does not indicate that the duty lay upon the Railway Company of producing the evidence of their servants, etc., only in case of suits being fought out in the Court of Small Causes. In my opinion the observation is general. It applies to all the Courts in this country.¶

But an express decision on the point or a finding on that particular question is not necessary in this case, because the defendants have chosen to lead evidence, whether under the authority of this case or otherwise, and if once they chose to lead such evidence, they should have completed the chain; that they have not done. Therefore, as far as this case is concerned, I am in complete agreement with the exhaustive judgment of my learned senior brother, and I would also dismiss this appeal with costs.

MISCELLANEOUS SECOND CIVIL APPEAL
 No. 2474 of 1926.

March 14, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Jai Lal.
ABDULLAH—JUDGMENT-DEBTOR—

RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 60 (1) (c)—
'Agriculturist', meaning of—Agriculturists of Punjab by virtue of special notification, whether within the term.

The term 'agriculturist' as used in s. 60, Civil Procedure Code, means a person whose main source of income is actual cultivation or tillage of land and the protection afforded by s. 60 (1) (c) does not necessarily extend to persons who are merely agriculturists by virtue of notifications issued by the Local Government under some special Act, e. g., the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, [p. 46, col. 1.]

Miscellaneous second appeal from an order of the District Judge, Hoshiarpur, dated the 15th May, 1926, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Third Class, Batala, District Gurdaspur, dated the 2nd February, 1926.

Mr. S. C. Chatterji, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. J. Rustomji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In execution of a money-decree passed against Abdullah, appellant, the Anjuman Dehi of Mauza Bariar in the Tahsil of Batala, attached a house belonging to the judgment-debtor. An objection was raised by the latter that the house could not be attached under s. 60 (1) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code, as he is an agriculturist and occupies it. This objection was rejected by the Subordinate Judge and on appeal has been dismissed by the District Judge. Consequently this second appeal has been filed by the judgment-debtor.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the view of the learned District Judge that s. 60 of the Civil Procedure Code is intended to afford protection to actual cultivators of land is wrong and that the expression "agriculturist" in s. 60 of the Civil Procedure Code is synonymous with the term as it is used in certain legislative provisions which apply to this Province, as for instance, the Alienation of Land Act, in other words, it is contended, that it means any person who belongs to an agricultural tribe, that it is immaterial whether he own any land or not and further that in any case it means a person whose main income is derived from agriculture whether the land is cultivated by himself or by his tenants. This contention is clearly opposed to previous authority.

In Bawa Gurbakhsh Singh v. Gulam Qadir (1) a learned Judge of the Chief Court of the Punjab held that the word "agriculturist" as used in s. 266 (c) [which is the same as s. 60 (1) (c) of the present Code] denotes a husbandman and a person who carries on and makes his living by tillage and not a mere owner of land and that "the object of the Legislature is to provide on economic grounds against cultivators of land being hindered or obstructed from earning their livelihood or practising their calling, and against land being thrown out of cultivation by such attachments at the instance of mere holders of money-decrees. If the District Judge's reasoning is correct, the mere possession of land by the debtor is quite sufficient to protect him from having his dwelling houses sold in execution of the decree. He may be a trader or banker or a person practising one of the learned professions, but if he has some land from which he gets rents, in cash or in kind, his dwelling house, though it may be a palatial one, must be exempt from attachment. This cannot be the meaning of the clause. It seems to be mainly intended for the benefit of the poorer class of husbandmen who carry on or make their living by actual cultivation". It was found in that case that though the judgment-debtor was a large land owner he did not cultivate the land himself nor did he own any agricultural cattle. His income was derived from rents paid by tenants to whom his land was let. The learned Judge held that such a person was not entitled to the protection afforded by s. 266 (c) or 60 (1) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code.

A Division Bench of the Bombay High Court held in Rubine v. Balwantrai Ramnarayan Trivide (2) that in order to enable a judgment-debtor to get the benefit of s. 60 (1) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code it must be proved that the judgment-debtor earns his livelihood wholly or principally by agriculture or that he ordinarily engages personally in agricultural labour. It was found that "at the most the judgment debtor seems to have leased 150 acres of land some of which he let out again to tenants and some he tilled by the aid of servants". One of his witnesses stated that he saw the defendant supervise the cultivation of his land. The above facts, it was held, were not sufficient to entitle the judgment-debtor to a finding that he was personally engaged in agricultural labour and was, therefore, an agriculturist as defined in s. 60 (1) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code.

In Bhuta v. Bisheshar Singh (3) the Allahabad High Court held that a person does not cease to be an agriculturist even if he has lost his agricultural land if it is established that he was cultivating the soil for remuneration. The judgment-debtor in that case admittedly belonged to an agricultural caste and it was found that she had no other source of livelihood except cultivation of land whether her own or of others. It was also found that she had still got some shikmi land. One of the learned Judges who decided that case was of opinion that on the facts proved the judgment-debtor was an agriculturist. The other learned Judge who was a party to the judgment concurred but with considerable hesitation. He based his decision more on the admission made by the decree-holder in some previous proceedings in which he had alleged that the judgment-debtor had been given some land to live on, that her father had built some houses for her thereon and also that she owned two pairs of bullocks for cultivation. It was on this admission that the learned Judge preferred to hold that the judgment-debtor was an agriculturist.

I do not, therefore, think that this last case materially helps the appellant. On the other hand, some observations made by the learned Judges appear to support the contention of the decree holders. In any case the two other authorities that have already been referred to clearly show that the term "agriculturist" as used in s. 60 means a person whose main source of income is actual cultivation or tillage of land and that the protection afforded by s. 60 (1) (c) does not necessarily extend to the persons who are merely agriculturists by virtue of notifications issued by the Local Government under the special Acts applicable to this Province. In the case before me it has been established that the judgment-debtor does not cultivate any land himself as he is physically unfit to do so. He owns some land which is let out to tenants on the batai system. He does not own any cattle. The house in question is used for stabling his mare and storage of fodder for the mare. Under the circumstances I hold that the judgment-debtor has been rightly held not to be an agriculturist within the meaning of s. 60 (1) (c) of the Civil Procedure Code and that in any case the house is not occupied by him as such.

The consequence is that this appeal is dismissed with costs.

ORIGINAL CIVIL JURISDICTION SUIT.

No. 1363 OF 1926.

July 22, 1927.

Present :—Mr. Justice Madgavkar.

VADILAL PURSHOTTAM—PLAINTIFF

versus

KANAIALAL INDERLAL—DEFENDANT.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Debt contracted by father for joint family purpose—Execution of mortgage as sole owner—Sale of father's interest in execution—Son's interest, whether passes.

A Hindu having a son and a minor grandson borrowed money for purposes of the joint family business and executed a mortgage of property belonging to the family representing that he was the exclusive owner of the property. The mortgagee instituted a suit against him on the mortgage without impleading either his son or grandson as a party and sold the right, title and interest whatsoever of the judgment-debtor and purchased it himself. In a suit by the mortgagee purchaser for possession the minor grandson contended that his rights were not affected by the sale :

Held, that the right, title and interest of the minor grandson also passed to the purchaser, in spite of his absence in the mortgage, suit and execution proceedings. [p. 48, col. 2.]

Daulat Ram v. Mehr Chand (3), followed.

FACTS.—Nandlal, a Hindu, had a son. Inderlal and a minor grandson Kanaialal. Nandlal and Inderlal were trading together. Nandlal executed a deed of mortgage to the plaintiff to discharge certain debts contracted by him for carrying on the trading business. In the mortgage-deed Nandlal did not disclose the fact that the property mortgaged was joint family property but executed the same as exclusive owner. The plaintiff sued Nandlal on the mortgage, obtained a decree and purchased "the right, title and interest, claim and demand, whatsoever of the said Nandlal." The plaintiff filed a suit for possession against the minor grandson as the latter claimed to be in possession of the property. The grandson contended that his interests were not affected by the sale as he was not represented either in the mortgage, suit or the execution proceedings, and that the plaintiff had purchased only the interest of Nandlal.

Mr. Mulla, (with him Messrs. Kanga, Advocate General, B. J. Desai and Setalvad), for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Lalji (with him Mr. Daphtary), for the Defendant.

JUDGMENT.—The question in this suit relates to the right, title and interest, if any, of defendant No. 1 Kanaialal, minor, and his mother and guardian defendant No. 2, Laxmibai, in respect of certain property mortgaged by defendant No. 1's grandfather Nandlal to the plaintiff, on which the latter obtained a decree, and which was sold and purchased in execution by the plaintiff-mortgagee-decree-holder.

[His Lordship stated the facts and proceeded as follows:] It is admitted by both sides that the real question in this suit is whether, the right, title and interest of defendant No. 1 has or has not passed to the plaintiff by his purchase. It is argued for the plaintiff, firstly, that the mortgage in his favour was executed for an antecedent debt due to Maganlal and to Uderam and that Nandlal was, therefore, competent to mortgage defendant No. 1's interest along with his own to the plaintiff, and, secondly, that he had actually done so and the interest of defendant No. 1 has passed to the plaintiffs in consequence of their legal proceedings above. It is further argued that even if the antecedent debt was not a joint family trading debt, under the Hindu Law as laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council, as in Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad Rai (1), defendant No. 1 has no interest left and that his grandfather could and did alienate in favour of the plaintiffs. For the defendants it is argued that there is no evidence to show that the debts were incurred for a joint family business, much less, an ancestral joint family trading business, and that the question is not, whether Nandlal had or had not the power to alienate the interest of defendant No. 1, but, whether he actually did so, and that, in any case, defendant No. 1 not having been a party to the mortgage, or the suit, or the proceedings in execution, his interest has not passed. These proceedings, moreover, had been against Nandlal individually and not as manager of the joint family, and reliance is placed on the cases quoted at page 848 of Mulla's Civil Procedure Code (8th Ed.). The plaintiff relies on the view of the law laid down in Suraj Bansi Koer v. Sheo Persad Singh (2) and Doulat Ram v. Mehr Chand (3). As regards defendant No. 2, it is contended, that she is not a necessary party because although in her first letter of August 14, 1925, she claimed that she had been in possession, there are subsequent letters of September 16, 1925, in which it is asserted that defendant No. 1 alone was in possession.

Dealing with the question as regards defendant No. 1, in the first instance, it is necessary to state clearly the facts as they appear to me to which the law has to be applied. In the case of a document such as the mortgage now in question, there are three possible cases which may arise. Firstly, those where the interest of a co-parcener is expressly included or excluded. Secondly, those where it is neither explicitly included or excluded. Thirdly, those where there is no mention of the property being joint family property, or of the existence of any co-parcener at all other than the executing party.

The first class presents no difficulty. As an instance of the second I might refer to Dayanand Pandurang Nerkar v. Daji Narayan Nerkar (4). The present case, in my opinion, falls in the third category. The defendants rely on certain words in the conveyance, viz., "the right, title and interest, claim and demand, whatsoever of the said Nandlal." The document, however, read not by single phrases, but taken as a whole, is in the usual form of a mortgage passed by an exclusive owner. Nowhere is there mention of the fact that the property is joint family property, or any reference to a co-parcener, even to the son Inderlal.

As regards the consideration and the dealings, I am of opinion that Nandlal and his son Inderlal were carrying on a joint family business. The inclusion in it of Nandlal's natural brother Ramcoover is further proof, if needed, and even points towards an ancestral joint family business, though as to its ancestral nature there is no such clear evidence as to justify a finding in favour of the plaintiff. However, this joint family business, though not proved to be ancestral, was carried on by Nandlal with his natural brother Ramcoover given in adoption and his son Inderlal, and became indebted to Maganlal and Uderam. And in order to pay them off Nandlal executed the mortgage in suit, and executed it representing himself as the sole owner and concealing from the plaintiff the existence of the share of minor defendant No. 1, whose age at the date of the suit is given as thirteen, and, therefore, at the date of the mortgage would be about six. As Inderlal is not a party to this suit it is not necessary to express any opinion in regard to his interest but only as to how far on these facts the interest of defendant No. 1 still remains, or whether it has been comprised in the sale to the plaintiff. It is not denied that the amount advanced by the plaintiff went to re-pay Uderam and Maganlal.

That it would have been open to Nandlal to say that it was the joint family property and to mortgage not merely his own interest but also that of defendant No. 1 in order to pay off the antecedent debt, cannot be and is not questioned in view of the law as laid down in Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad Rai (1), correcting the view of antecedent debts previously enunciated in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (5). The question in this suit is, whether, because Nandlal instead of so doing purported to represent himself as sole owner and to mortgage his entire interest, concealing the existence of defendant No. 1 and defendant No. 1's interest, whether this conduct of Nandlal saves the interest of defendant No. 1 in the present suit? In considering this question, considerations of logic are out of place and indeed misleading; for on a question of this kind in Hindu Law, as their Lordships of the Privy Council have observed in Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad Rai (1), referred to above, the law on the subject is somewhat illogical.

From the standpoint of equity, it might be said for the plaintiff that he could hardly ascertain the existence of a grandson of six and that he would not have advanced on or purchased a one-third interest. For the defendant No. 1 it could be argued that the misrepresentation of a grandfather and of a manager should not result in a loss to a minor co-parcener of his own interest.

As regards the actual intention of Nandlal, it follows from what I have said; not only that he had no intention of leaving out unburdened the interest of defendant No. 1, but that he went even further and purported to be the sole owner himself. As far as the intention goes, therefore, it was not his intention to mortgage his own interest alone and to leave the interest of defendant No. 1 unburdened. I am unable to accept the contention for the defendant No. 1 that his absence from the mortgage, the suit, and execution proceeding, does not render his share liable. Mere absence in such cases does not suffice. In the case of Daulat Ram v. Mehr Chand (3) the two managers had concealed the existence of the other co-parceners and passed a mortgage purporting to be themselves the sole owners to the exclusion of everybody else. The plaintiffs offered to prove, but the defendants refused to join issue upon the facts alleged by the plaintiffs showing that the mortgage validly bound the ancestral estate and business. The defendants relied upon their absence in the legal proceedings. It was held by their Lordships that this contention failed, and that the sale passed the whole estate to which it related. I am, therefore, of opinion that the mere absence of defendant No. 1 is not sufficient to enable him to claim his share.

The only other question of law which remains for consideration, therefore, is, whether because in this case it is proved that the mortgage was to pay off antecedent debts in the joint family business due from Nandlal and Inderlal, but the business is not proved to be ancestral, whether, this single circumstance suffices to free defendant No. 1's share. According to the law as laid down in Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad Rai (1) I am of opinion that it does not so suffice. The mortgage was such that it could validly bind the entire interest including the interest of defendant No. 1. The manager ignoring the existence of defendant No. 1 purported to be the sole owner and to mortgage his entire interest. Therefore, as in the case of Daulat Ram v. Mehar Chand (3), the sale in execution of the mortgage passed the entire estate including the share of defendant No. 1. This disposes of the case in so far as it relates to defendant No. 1.

As regards defendant No. 2, for all practical purposes, the issue is not of very great significance. Both the defendants are represented throughout by the same attorneys and by one Counsel, defendant No. 2 having only put in a separate written statement. On the whole, seeing that it was defendant No. 2 who at first claimed possession and that defendant No. 1 being a minor it was she who afterwards was asserting the rights opposed to those of the plaintiff, I am of opinion that it was open to the plaintiff to implead her pro majore cautela.

Decree for the plaintiff in terms of prayers (a), (b) and (c) of the plaint.

As regards compensation, the parties agree that defendant No. 1 should pay at the rate of Rs. 200 per month from September 24, 1925, until possession. The defendant to pay this amount to the plaintiff accordingly.

Defendant No. 2 does not claim any separate interest of her own. The suit as against her fails.

Defendant No. 1 to pay plaintiff's costs of the suit. Defendant No. 2 to pay her own.

On the slender materials before me, I am of opinion that the amount of compensation agreed upon is fair, in view of the delay and the costs of further proceedings in this Court or a reference to the Commissioner. I, therefore, sanction the compromise as to compensation so far as regards the minor defendant No. 1 under O. XXX, Civil Procedure Code.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1526 OF 1924.

May 10, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Iqbal Ahmad.

BACHAN SINGH—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT
versus

BHIKA SINGH—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Minor—Guardian ad litem—Decree against minor, when liable to be set aside—Mere failure of guardian to diligently prosecute suit, effect of—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 60 (c)—House of agriculturist—Exemption from attachment—Burden of proof—‘Agriculturist,’ definition of—Zemindars, whether agriculturists—Presumption.

A decree obtained against a minor represented by a duly constituted guardian is binding on the minor unless there is something to show that there was any fraud on behalf of the guardian. The mere failure of a guardian to diligently prosecute the case on behalf of the minor cannot have the effect of vitiating such a decree. [p. 50, col. 2; p. 51, col. 1.]

Chandar Sekhar Tewari v. Balakdhari Dubey (1), Beni Prasad v. Lajja Ram (2) and Lala Ram v. Thakur Prasad (3), followed.

A person whose main source of income is zemindari land and who does not himself carry on cultivation is not an ‘agriculturist’ within the meaning of s. 60 (c) of the Code of Civil Procedure. [p. 51, col. 2.]

The party who alleges himself to be an agriculturist must prove that he earns his livelihood wholly or principally by agriculture, or that he ordinarily engages personally in agricultural labour. [ibid.]

An agriculturist whose house is protected from attachment and sale by s. 60 (c) of the Code must be an agriculturist belonging to the class of persons who are ordinarily designated as agriculturists, that is, whose principal source of livelihood is by cultivation. Cultivation to a certain extent may be carried on by most zemindars but their houses cannot on that account be designated as agriculturists’ houses. [ibid.]

Lachhman Dass v. Partapi (4) and Ashmatulla Sircar v. Pan Mahmud Chowdhury (5), followed.

Even if a person is both an agriculturist and a zemindar, the burden of proving that a house in dispute is strictly of the nature contemplated by s. 60 (c) of the Code is on the person who alleges it. [p. 52, col. 1.]

There is no presumption that a zemindar is an agriculturist. The presumption is just the other way and a zemindar must be taken to be a zemindar unless his main source of income is proved to be from cultivation. [ibid.]

Second appeal from a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Farrukhabad, dated the 30th of August, 1924.

Mr. Benod Behari Lal, for the Appellant.
Dr. M. Walli-ullah, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT. While I am anxious not to in any way abridge the effect of s. 100 of the Civil Procedure Code and not to depart from the well-established rule that the findings of fact recorded by a Court of first appeal are binding in second appeal, I cannot, in view of the equally well established rule that inference from proved facts is always a question of law, affirm the finding or the decision of the lower Appellate Court in this case. After an examination of the record I have come to the conclusion that the findings recorded by the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court are not borne out by the facts found by him, and that the conclusion at which the trial Court arrived was correct.

One Ganga Din obtained a simple money-decree against Chandan Singh father of the defendant-respondent on the 28th of February 1910. Before the decree could be executed Chandan Singh died, and the defendant-respondent, who was then a minor and is still a minor, was brought upon the record as a judgment-debtor in place of his father. The father's sister of the defendant was appointed defendant's guardian ad litem. On the house in dispute being attached by Ganga Din in execution of his decree, an objection was preferred in the execution department by the defendant's guardian ad litem questioning the right of the decree-holder to sell the house in dispute on exactly the same grounds on which the present suit was resisted by the defendant-respondent. It appears that the objections that were taken were not pressed and were eventually disallowed and the house in dispute was sold in execution of Ganga Din's decree and purchased by the plaintiff-appellant on the 7th of November, 1913. The plaintiff-appellant made no attempt to take possession of the house for a period of about 11 years and instituted the present suit for possession of the house on the 11th of January, 1924.

One of the pleas urged in defence was that Chandan Singh, the defendant-respondent's father was a drunkard, a spendthrift and a man of loose character and the debt in respect of which the decree was obtained by Ganga Din was tainted with immorality. This common form of defence which is usually taken by a Hindu son in order to deprive a creditor of the debts advanced by him to a Hindu father, totally broke down in the trial Court, and no attempt was made to challenge the finding of the trial Court on the point in the lower Appellate Court.

The suit was resisted on two other grounds, viz.—

(1) "all the proceedings have been taken in collusion with Puttu Singh", the certifi-cated guardian of the contesting defendant and brother-in-law (sister's husband) of the plaintiff and the defendant is not bound by the same and the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree for possession of the house; and

(2) that the house in dispute belonged to, and was in occupation of, the defendant as an agriculturist and as such, was not liable to sale in execution of the decree held by Ganga Din, in view of the provisions of s. 60 (c) of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Both these contentions were overruled by the trial Court and the plaintiff's suit was decreed. On appeal by the defendant the lower Appellate Court has differed from the trial Court on both the points and has held that "the house in suit is an agriculturist's house as contemplated in s. 60, Civil Procedure Code, and it could not be sold in execution of the simple money-decree against the minor's father and that its sale was brought about fraudulently".

As already remarked above I am unable to accept these findings of the lower Appellate Court as binding on me in second appeal. The learned Subordinate Judge who decided the appeal was of opinion that, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant's guardian ad litem in the execution proceedings had objected to the attachment and sale of the house on the ground that the house was an agriculturist's house and that objection was not given effect to by the Execution Court because of the failure of the defendant's guardian ad litem to diligently prosecute the case, the defendant, because of his minority, was entitled to question the validity of the execution sale on the ground that the sale of the house was in contravention of the provisions of s. 60 (c), Civil Procedure Code. I am unable to agree with the lower Appellate Court. It is not suggested that the guardian ad litem (father's sister) of the defendant who acted as defendant's guardian ad litem in the execution case, was in collusion with Ganga Din or the present plaintiff, or was in any way prevented by any person from duly protecting the interests of the defendant. It cannot be denied that the defendant was represented by a duly constituted guardian in the execution proceedings, and the mere failure of the guardian to diligently prosecute the case on behalf of the defendant cannot have the effect of vitiating the order of the Execution Court. The only duty cast upon a litigant by law is that he must see that a minor, who is a party to a suit or proceeding in a Court of Law, is represented by a duly constituted guardian, but there is no obligation on him to see that the guardian ad litem vigilantly prosecutes the case on behalf of the minor. Undoubtedly a guardian ad litem is bound to protect the interests of a minor by raising and substantiating appropriate pleas on his behalf, but this duty is not shared by the minor's adversaries in the suit. A decree obtained against a minor who was represented by a duly constituted guardian is binding on the minor unless there is something to show that there was any fraud on behalf of the guardian. This was the view taken by this Court in the cases of Chander Sekhar Tewari v. Balakdhari Dubey (1) and Beni Prasad v. Lajja Ram (2). In my opinion the mere fact of the defendant's minority is not a sufficient ground for differentiating the present case with the case reported as Lala Ram v. Thakur Prasad (3). I, therefore, hold that the plea that the house in dispute was an agriculturist's house could not be raised in the present suit and was barred by the principle of constructive res judicata.

Moreover, it appears to me that the finding of the lower Appellate Court that the house in dispute is an agriculturist's house is an impossible finding. The lower Appellate Court has assigned two reasons for recording a finding on the point in the defendant's favour. It has observed "firstly, from the respondent's own statement made before me recorded on paper No. 58-A it is clear that the defendant-appellant is an agriculturist. He has no other source of income. A pure and simple zemindar is to be taken as an agriculturist in the absence of any legal definition to the contrary. Secondly, from the same statement of the respondent (appellant) it is also evident that the house in suit is the only dwelling house that he has now got and in it his father, Chander Singh, lived. The other one that he had, fell into ruins. A reference to paper No. 58-A upon the record shows that the summary of the statement of the plaintiff given by the learned Subordinate Judge is entirely at variance with the statement made by the plaintiff. The plaintiff stated that "the sir and khudkasht of Bhika Singh (defendant) is let out on rent. No other business except zemindari is carried on by the minor. The zemindari of the minor is looked after by Hardeo Singh who is my brother-in-law and who is the guardian of the minor". The only conclusion that can be drawn from this statement of the plaintiff is that the defendant is not an agriculturist. It is clear that the plaintiff nowhere committed himself to the statement that the defendant's source or chief source of livelihood was by cultivating land. On the contrary it appears that cultivation was not carried on by the minor and his source of income was from the zemindari land. This being so it cannot be held that the house in dispute is an agriculturist's house. It has been pointed out in the case of Lachhman Dass v. Partapi (4), that "an agriculturist is not a person who obtains his livelihood otherwise than by cultivating himself or through his servants, even if he may have some sort of interest in a field or two". An agriculturist whose house is protected from attachment and sale by s. 60 (c) of the Civil Procedure Code must be an agriculturist belonging to the class of persons who are ordinarily designated as agriculturists, that is, whose principal source of livelihood is by cultivation. Cultivation to a certain extent is carried on by most, if not all the zemindars, in this Province but their houses cannot be designated as agriculturists' houses. The view that I take finds support from the decision in the case of Ashmatulla Sircar v. Pan Mahmud Chowdhary (5).

It is also well-established that "the party who alleges himself to be an agriculturist must prove that he earns his livelihood wholly or principally by agriculture or that he ordinarily engages personally in agricultural labour;" Rubine v. Balwantrai Ramnarayan Trividi (6). The assumption made by the lower Appellate Court in the present case that the defendant-respondent's only source of income is from cultivation is without foundation as the defendant-respondent owns zemindari property, and it cannot be said that the house did not belong to and was in his occupation as a zemindar.

In arriving at the finding that the house in dispute is an agriculturist's house the lower Appellate Court has not referred to the oral evidence adduced by the defendant,

(1) 15 Ind. Cas. 811; 10 A. L. J. 149.

(2) 35 Ind. Cas. 63; 14 A. L. J. 433; 38 A. 452.

(3) 47 Ind. Cas. 947; 16 A. L. J. 691; 40 A. 950.

(4) 85 Ind. Cas. 700; A. I. R. 1925 Oudh 365; 10 O. & A. L. R. 1275.

(5) 35 Ind. Cas. 343; 20 C. W. N. 874.

(6) 105 Ind. Cas. 793; A. I. R. 1923 Bom. 12.

But I, for the sake of satisfying myself as to the accuracy or otherwise of the finding of the lower Appellate Court on the point, have looked into the evidence produced by the defendant respondent. The evidence consists of the statement of two witnesses named Khamu Singh and Hori Singh and both these witnesses were examined mainly with a view to support the plea of the defendant-respondent as to the immorality of his father. Hori Singh stated that Chandan Singh used to look after the work of his zemindari and that there is still zemindari and sir. Khannu Singh's statement was that Chandan Singh had kasht, sir and occupancy holdings. It does not appear from the statements of these two witnesses that the main source of livelihood of Chandan Singh and the defendant-respondent was from cultivation. Even if it be held that Chandan Singh was both an agriculturist and a zemindar the burden of proving that the house in dispute was strictly of the nature contemplated by s. 60 (c) of the Civil Procedure Code was on the defendant-respondent: vide the case of Jamma Prasad Raut v. Raghunath Prasad (7).

It is not denied that the plaintiff-appellant was not a party to the suit brought by Ganga Din and purchased the house in dispute in execution of the decree held by Ganga Din. He was justified in believing that the house was saleable in execution of the decree; vide the case of Pandurang Balaji v. Krishnaji Govind Parab (8).

For the reasons given above I am unable to accept the finding of the lower Appellate Court that the house in suit was an agriculturist's house within the meaning of s. 60 (c) of the Civil Procedure Code. I am equally unable to affirm the proposition of law propounded by the lower Appellate Court that "a pure and simple zemindar is to be taken as an agriculturist in the absence of any legal definition to the contrary." In my opinion the presumption is the other way. A zemindar must be taken to be a zemindar unless his main source of income is proved to be from cultivation.

In support of the finding that "the sale of the house in dispute was brought about fraudulently," the lower Appellate Court has assigned the following reasons:—

(1) "The plaintiff respondent is the

(7) 19 Ind. Cas. 125; 35 A. 307; 11 A. L. J. 437.

(8) 28 B. 125; 5 Bom. L. R. 799.

brother-in-law (wife's brother) of the appellant's certificated guardian, Hardeo Singh, who did not agree to look after the appellant's interest in the case."

(2) "The purchase of the house by the appellant (respondent) looks to be suspicious" inasmuch as the plaintiff had purchased certain zemindari belonging to the defendant "and afterwards quietly transferred it to his sister, wife of the appellant's (defendant's) guardian (Hardeo Singh alias Putto Singh) who is himself residing in the house to the exclusion of the defendant."

(3) That the suit was brought more than 10 years after the purchase and, therefore, "may be reasonably presumed to have been inspired by the same self-seeking certificated guardian" of the defendant and it would not be surprising if the plaintiff after his success in the litigation transfers the house also to his sister.

(4) "The circumstances denote that the guardian is pulling the strings from behind with a view to depriving the minor of his ancestral dwelling-house in which he has comfortably nestled himself." It appears impossible to me to infer fraud from the facts found or the reasons assigned by the lower Appellate Court."

No particulars of the alleged fraud were given in the written statement, and none were disclosed in the evidence produced by the defendant-respondent, and nobody in this Court has been able to let me know the particulars or the precise nature of the fraud found by the lower Appellate Court.

It is clear from a reference of the statement of Hardeo Singh, dated the 20th of February, 1924, that he was not a certificated guardian of the defendant at the time that Ganga Din executed his decree and the plaintiff purchased the house in dispute. It is true that in the suit, giving rise to the present appeal, Hardeo Singh, notwithstanding the fact that he was a certificated guardian of the defendant, refused to act as his guardian ad litem. But this refusal of Hardeo Singh can in no way lead to the inference that the sale that took place in 1913, when Hardeo Singh had nothing to do with the defendant was brought about fraudulently. It appears to me that Hardeo Singh was well advised, having regard to his relationship with the plaintiff-respondent, in not acting as guardian ad litem of the defendant in the present suit. In any case his refusal to so act in the present case or his desire that the plaintiff should succeed in the present litigation cannot lead to the inference that the sale of 1913 was a fraudulent sale.

I am unable to appreciate the ground on which the learned Subordinate Judge has held the purchase of the house made by the plaintiff to be suspicious, and there is no warrant for the assumption that after succeeding in the present litigation the plaintiff will transfer the house to his sister, the wife of Hardeo Singh. Even if it be assumed that Hardeo Singh is now anxious to get possession of this house and that it was he who asked the plaintiff to purchase the house in 1913, the purchase made by the plaintiff at a time when Hardeo Singh was not a certificated guardian of the defendant, cannot be held to be vitiated by fraud. It is needless to point out that fraud must be specifically pleaded and each particular thereof must be strictly proved. I have examined the evidence in the case and I find that there is not an iota of evidence to suggest that the sale of 1913 was brought about by fraud and in my judgment the finding of the lower Appellate Court on the point is based on pure conjectures, and is bad in law.

For the reasons given above I allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore the decree of the trial Court with costs in all Courts.

Application against a decree of the Small Cause Court Judge, Khandwa, dated the 23rd December, 1926, in Civil Suit No. 1292 of 1926

Mr. G. R. Deo, for the Applicant.

Mr. S. B. Gokhale, for the Non-Applicants.

ORDER.—As the result of certain past dealings, between the parties, which were adjusted by them, a balance was struck, which showed that, on 6th June, 1923, the defendants were liable to plaintiff, in the sum of Rs. 514-7-6. Defendant No. 2, purporting to act for himself and for his father, defendant No. 1, signed a ruju hisab, and orally agreed to re-pay, with interest, the sum found due, at the rate of Re. 1 per cent. per mensem, within one month of the execution of the hisab. Plaintiff filed the present suit for the recovery of Rs. 724-15-3 inclusive of interest up to the date of the suit, viz, 16th June, 1926.

Defendant No. 1 denied his liability on the ground of non-execution and limitation. Defendant No. 2 admitted the signing of the ruju, but denied that the ruju was an account stated, and urged that only items aggregating Rs. 66-3-9, were within time, and plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to anything more than that amount on the strength of the ruju. It is significant to note that defendant No. 2 did not deny the plaintiff's allegations in para. 1 of the plaint about the oral agreement to re-pay within one month. Plaintiff's claim was decreed for such items as were in time at the date of the execution of the ruju with interest thereon, and the rest of the claim was dismissed as barred by time. The claim was wholly dismissed as against defendant No. 1 for want of execution by him and only partly decreed against defendant No. 2. In arriving at this conclusion the Court below treated the ruju hisab as a mere acknowledgment, and not as account stated or as a mutual, open and Current account. The plaintiff has come up in revision against the decision.

As to the defendant No. 1's liability for the claim no serious attempt was made to show how he was bound by the admission of liability made by defendant No. 2 in regard to the balance found due on adjustment of the khata which stood in the name of both on 6th June, 1923. The dismissal of the claim as against defendant No. 1 must, therefore, stand.

The next question is whether the ruju hisab was a mere acknowledgment, or an account stated, or a mutual, open and current account. If it was a mere acknowledgment and the items disallowed were advanced on dates long prior to three years of the date of acknowledgment, the dismissal of the claim must hold good. So far as the contention that the account was a mutual, open and current account, suffice it to say that the nature of the dealings is not such that the balance must shift on one side or the other. Article 85 of the Limitation Act does not, therefore, apply.

As to whether the case comes under Art. 64 of the Limitation Act, I may observe that, where an account stated comprises items on both sides and a balance is deducted thereon, that balance is recoverable within three years from the statement of account, although some of the earlier items in the account may have then been already time-barred. If the entries on page 2 of the hisab bahi were scrutinised, it will be found that, on the day of the settlement, the account was made of items beginning from Fagun Badi 30 Sambat 1975, and ending with 11 Jeth Badi 8, Sambat 1980. The account, on the face of it, thus shows that several items of more than three years standing were taken into consideration in the balance due, without objection on the part of the executant. Interest was also calculated and added on that basis; and, although, under date Magh Sudi 5 Sambat 1977, a sum of Rs. 115 was debited to the defendant's khata as the price of a pair of bullocks, that item was wiped out by a corresponding credit entry of Rs. 115 as the price of the pair of bullocks as they were returned, under dated 6th June, 1923. This credit was again squared by a debit under the maveshi khata i. e., for purchase of cattle. Then again, a debit item of Rs. 69-2-0, on account of havala of one Budha for a sum of Rs. 50 advanced to him, and interest thereon, from mitti Shravan Sudi 4 Sambat 1977 to Duja Jeth Badi 30 Sambat 1980, also appears debited in the defendant's khata, and, on the strength of that debit, a credit appears to have been given to Budha towards his liability. All this adjustment points to the common intention of the parties, to set off their cross-demands against each other, and to strike a balance, in plaintiff's favour, of whatever may be found due to him, by consolidation of all items, whether barred or not barred by time, and to start with a fixed consolidated amount as representing the defendant's liability, for the future.

It appears that following upon this common understanding, and with a view to give full effect to the same, the plaintiff credited the sum of Rs. 514-7-6 so found due, and thus squared up the previous account. This, to my mind, is tantamount to a new contract, and, is a substantive cause of action in itself; so that a suit can be maintained on it. Especially as I find that the plaintiff debited the defendants with the amount of Rs. 514-7-6 under Jeth Badi 8 Sambat 1990, I have no hesitation in holding that the question of some items being then time-barred is irrelevant to the case as laid. It is, therefore, very likely that the plaintiff's allegation that the executant of the hisab made a verbal promise to re-pay the consolidated debt within one month was true and, therefore, defendant No. 2 did not dare to deny it.

I, therefore, modify the decision of the lower Court and decree the entire claim against defendant No. 2 with costs in both the Courts. As defendants Nos. 1 and 2 appeared through the same Pleader, defendant No. 1 will not get any separate costs in this Court. Pleader's fee Rs. 15.

Mr. Pahlajsing B. Advani, for the Applicant.

Mr. Tahilram Maniram, for the Opponent.

ORDER.—This is an application under O. XXI, r. 58, Civil Procedure Code. It is connected with Execution Application No. 795 of 1925 filed in Suit No. 700 of 1924. I propose to deal with both the applications together.

In the present case the firm of Nihchalsing Mahtabsing are the judgment creditors and the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan are the judgment-debtors. The managing partner of the debtor firm is one Vishinji Devji who was adjudicated as an insolvent in Insolvency Application No. 59 of 1922 and his estate has vested in the Official Receiver. By a deed of assignment dated June 24, 1925, the judgment-creditors have assigned their decree to the firm of Lakhmichand Ohimanlal by their managing partner Lakhmichand Ghanamal for a sum of Rs. 400 with an express covenant that the assignees will have no claim against the judgment-creditors in the event of their failing to realize anything under the decree which is for about Rs. 6,500.

The name of the assignee was brought on the record by an order passed by Tyabji, A. J. C., on August 10, 1925, and at their instance of August 17, 1925, the amount due to the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan under the decree passed in their favour in Suit No. 700 of 1924 was ordered to be attached.

Suit No. 700 of 1924 was instituted by the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan by their managing partner Vishinji Devji as plaintiff No. 1 after his insolvency and by the Official Receiver in whom his estate had vested, as plaintiff No. 2. The defendant in that suit was Lakhmichand Ghanamal the managing partner of the assignees in this suit.

On October 30, 1924, a consent decree was passed in favour of the plaintiffs in Suit No. 700 of 1924 for about Rs. 4,500.

It is said that the only other partner in the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan was one Parshotam who advanced no capital to the firm and who left Karachi for Calcutta about one year before the insolvency of the capitalist partner presumably for the purpose of avoiding the creditors of the firm, and has not returned here since. The Official Receiver treated the assets and liabilities of the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan as those of Vishinji Devji and dealt with them as such and inter alia assigned the decretal claim in Suit No. 700 of 1924 to one Vazirchand who then applied for being brought on the record of the suit as assignee of the decree.

On objection being raised by Lakhmichand that the assignment of the Official Receiver alone was defective, the assignee obtained a fresh deed of assignment dated 11th July, 1925, from the Official Receiver and from the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan represented by their managing partner Vishinji Devji and on the strength of that deed has now applied in these proceedings for raising the attachment issued against the decree in Suit No. 700 of 1924 and has also applied in Suit No. 700 of 1924 for his name being brought on the record as assignee and for execution issuing against Lakhmichand Ghanamal under the said decree.

The application of Vazirchand for raising attachment is based on a two fold ground, firstly that the assignment of the decree in Suit No. 700 of 1924 in favour of Vazirchand being long prior to the order of attachment issued by the Executing Court, there was nothing to attach the right, if any, of the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan having vested in Vazirchand before the date of the said order. Secondly that the firm of Nihchalsing Mahtabsing having elected to proceed against the estate of Vishinji Devji in the hands of the Official Receiver and having proved their claim against his estate, and having thereby induced the Official Receiver to deal with the estate of the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan as that of Vishinji Devji it is not open to them to fall back on the property of the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan and their assignment if any is of no effect.

The execution of the deed of assignment in favour of Vazirchand dated July 11, 1925, marked Ex. 10-A has been duly proved.

It is urged on behalf of Lakhmichand who occupies dual capacity that it is of no effect as Vishinji Devji could not represent the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan after his insolvency and that, therefore, the money due to that firm should in the first instance be utilized for payment of the debts of the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan.

There is no force in this argument.

As held by me in Harnamdas v. Mayadas Lakhmichand (1) in India the insolvency or even the adjudication of a partner as an insolvent does not by itself dissolve the partnership but only affords the ground for the Court to decree dissolution. There is no allegation much less proof that any suit was filed by the insolvent or the Official Receiver or the working partner for dissolution of partnership or that such dissolution has been decreed.

It is no doubt true that by the disappearance of the working partner and the insolvency of the capitalist partner no fresh business was done, but it does not follow therefrom that the right of the capitalist partner to deal with the partnership property was thereby put an end to. It was, therefore, competent for Vishinji to act on behalf of the firm of Vishinji Goverdhan and to execute a deed of assignment on behalf of their firm validly transferring their interest in the decree in favour of the assignee. It would further appear that the object with which the assignment was made was to realize the assets of the firm for the purpose of discharging its liabilities.

The act of Vishinji in assigning the debt was, therefore, necessary for winding up the business. Even if it be assumed that the partnership between him and Parshotam had been dissolved the assignment was indubitably within his powers as defined by s. 263 of the Indian Contract Act.

It is further urged that the assignment of a decree takes effect only from the date of its recognition by the Court and as the assignment in favour of Vazirchand was not recognised before the attachment of the decree, it cannot now be recognised so as to affect the rights of the attaching creditors.

This plea is based on a misconception of law. There is nothing in the Code of Civil Procedure or any other law in force in India to warrant the suggestion that the transfer of a decree made by an instrument in writing should not take effect from the date of such instrument.

All that O. XXI, r. 16, Civil Procedure Code, provides is that a decree shall not be executed on the application of the assignee of the decree until the Court has given notice to the assignor and the judgment-debtor of such application and their objections, if any, heard to its execution. In Sadagopachariar v. Ragunadachariar (2) a similar plea was raised under the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 and was held to be bad. Their Lordships observed at page 63* as follows:—

"Under s. 487, Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) it was open to him, i. e., the assignee of the decree to present a claim to the attaching Court and if he had done so and had established his transfer, it would have been the duty of the attaching Court to withdraw the attachment in the case supposed, because by the assignment in writing the property in the decrees passed to the plaintiff so that the decrees were no longer liable to be attached as the property of the first defendant."

These observations equally apply to the present case. The assignee has applied for raising the attachment, and as the property in the decree passed to him on the date of the assignment there was nothing to attach, and he is entitled to have the attachment raised.

Under the circumstances it is not necessary for me to go into the further question of estoppel.

I allow the application for raising attachment with costs.

In the connected execution application which was stayed pending the disposal of the application I order that Vazirchand's name be brought on the record as assignee.

of that decree and further order that execution to issue as prayed by him.

1 Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115, O. XLI, r. 8—Interlocutory order—Revision—Powers of interference—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 12 (2) (3)—Copies of judgment and decree applied for, on different dates—Aggregate period, whether can be excluded—Copy of decree applied for before expiry of period as extended by s. 12 (2)—Period requisite for obtaining copy, whether can be excluded—Copy of judgment, filing of, in appeal, whether optional.

A High Court may interfere in revision against an interlocutory order where matters of principle or jurisdiction are involved. [p. 57, col. 2.]

A party is entitled to deduct under s. 12 of the Limitation Act the aggregate period taken by him in obtaining copies of the judgment and the decree, even though he applied for them on different dates, provided the applications were made before the expiry of the period of limitation prescribed for filing an appeal. [p. 58, col. 1.]

Bhagmal v. Firm of Jannadas Potdar (1) and Sheoram v. Chintoo (2), followed.

He is entitled to exclude under s. 12 (2) of the Act, the period required for obtaining a copy of the decree, where he has applied for the same before the expiry of the extended time allowed by s. 12 (3). [p. 58, col. 2.]

A suit was dismissed on the 24th August, 1926. The plaintiff applied for a copy of the judgment on the 8th September, 1926, and obtained the copy on the 30th September, 1926. He applied for a copy of the decree on the 7th October, 1926, and obtained the same on the 12th October, 1926, and an appeal which had to be filed within 30 days was filed on that day.

Held, that the appeal was not barred. [ibid.]

It is not optional for an appellant to file a copy of judgment with the memorandum of the appeal, even though it may be open to the Appellate Court to dispense with it. [ibid.]

Civil revision of an order of the District Judge, Bhandara, dated the 11th January, 1927, in Civil Appeal No. 82 of 1926.

Mr. G. L. Subhedar, for the Applicants.

Messrs. V. Bose and P. N. Rudra, for the Non-Applicant.

ORDER.—This revision raises an interesting question of law. The non-applicant, Mayaram, filed Suit No. 62 of 1925, in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Balaghat, against the applicants. That suit was dismissed on 24th August, 1926. Plaintiff applied for a copy of the judgment on 8th September, 1926, and obtained the same on 30th September, 1926. Thereafter, a copy of the decree was applied for on 7th October, 1926, and obtained on 12th October, 1926, and the appeal was filed, on that day, in the Court of the District Judge, Bhandara. The applicants took a preliminary objection that the appeal was barred by time, but the same was overruled, and the case was set down for hearing on the merits. It is against this interlocutory order overruling the objection as to limitation that this revision has been preferred.

The non-applicant raises objection to the maintainability of the present revision, on the ground that it is not the practice of this Court to entertain any revision against an interlocutory order. Suffice it to say, that although, this Court does not, ordinarily, interfere still, where, matters of principle or jurisdiction are involved, this Court does not, necessarily, decline to entertain it. I, therefore, think that the present revision can lie.

Now, as to the merits of this petition for revision, I say that the decision sought to be revised, is in accordance with the Statute Law, and, must be upheld. I will show how it is so.

The prescribed term of 30 days for filing an appeal against the decree expired on 23rd September, 1926; but, before such expiry, the non-applicant applied for copy of the judgment on 8th September, 1926, i. e., on the 15th day of the delivery of judgment, when he had still to his credit 15 days out of the prescribed period of limitation (Art. 152, Limitation Act). When, however, he obtained the copy of the judgment, on 30th September, 1926, the 15 days to his credit had expired, and, out of the period of 23 days which he was entitled to exclude as time requisite for obtaining the copy of the judgment, under cl. 3 of s. 12 of the Limitation Act he had still to his credit, a period of 16 days. Before the expiry of this period, i. e. when, only 6 days out of it had expired, he, on 7th October, 1926, applied for a copy of the decree, and, obtained it, on 12th October, 1926, i. e., when he had still 4 days to his credit, out of the aforesaid period. The appeal was filed on the very day. It will thus be seen that the appeal was instituted, on the 49th day from the date of judgment, or, excluding the 23 days time required for obtaining the copy of the judgment only, on the 26th day of the period of limitation prescribed by law. If the period of six days which was required for obtaining the copy of the decree, were excluded as he is entitled to exclude it, under cl. 2 of s. 12, his appeal would be still within time by 6 more days. In spite of this state of things, the applicants contended that the appeal was barred by limitation, by reason of the fact that, instead of applying for copy of the decree and of the judgment, simultaneously, or, at different times, within the period of 30 days prescribed by law for appealing, the non-applicant applied first for copy of judgment before the expiry, and then, for copy of the decree, after the expiry of the said period. It is argued that the non-applicant was not entitled to exclude the time taken up in obtaining a copy of the judgment as he had not first applied for obtaining a copy of the decree. I think this contention is unsound in view of the clear provisions of s. 12 of the Limitation Act, which entitle him to deduct both the periods of time.

As pointed out by Drake-Brockman, J.C., in Bagmal v. Firm of Jamnadas Poidar (1), it is a well-recognized practice for an unsuccessful litigant to obtain copy of judgment first so that he may consider whether he will appeal or accept failure. It is undoubtedly open to a litigant to postpone applying for copy of judgment and decree till the very last day of the scheduled period. Similarly Mittra, A. J. C., in Sheoram v. Chintoo (2), held that the law does not prescribe any particular time for the making of the applications for copies or require that copies of both decree and judgment must be applied for simultaneously. Accordingly in both those cases the aggregate period taken in obtaining copies of judgment and decree was excluded, even though applications for those copies were made on different dates, they were made before the expiry of the period of limitation prescribed for filing the appeal.

In the present case only one application, viz., that for obtaining copy of the judgment was filed within the period of limitation. So, even on the authority of the aforesaid decisions and the provisions of s. 12, (3), Limitation Act, the non-applicant's appeal could be treated as within time, without the necessity of excluding the period required for obtaining the copy of the decree. If the point were necessary for me to decide, I would hold that the non-applicant was entitled to exclude, under s. 12 (2) of the Act, even the period required for obtaining copy of the decree, provided he has applied for the copy of the decree, before the expiry of the extension of time allowed by s. 12 (3) as time required for obtaining copy of the judgment.

It is, however, argued before me that it is the decree which gives a right of appeal and it is, therefore, necessary to obtain a copy thereof in order to keep that right alive, and that since it is optional with the Court to dispense with the filing of a copy of judgment, the intending appellant should not be held entitled to exclude the time spent by him in obtaining a copy of an optional document, viz., judgment. No doubt under O. XXI, r. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, every memorandum of appeal must be accompanied by a copy of the decree appealed from and (unless the Appellate Court dispenses therewith) of the judgment on which it is founded, I need only say that it is not left to the litigant's choice to file or not to file a copy of judgment; inasmuch as it is not optional with him to obtain its copy or not, and Judge alone can dispense with it, the judgment cannot be said to be an optional document. It is as essential as the decree. It is, therefore, wholly immaterial in what order the copies are applied for and obtained. All that is required is that the period prescribed by the specific Article of the Limitation Schedule with the extension claimable under the provisions of s. 12 of the Limitation Act, should not have expired, before the copies were obtained and lodged with the memo. of appeal. In short, the right of appeal must be kept alive, under s. 12 of the Act, until the date the appeal is filed.

In this view of the case the revision is dismissed with costs. Pleader's fee Rs. 25.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 73, 83, 107—Contract for sale of unascertained goods—Subsequent appropriation by seller—Appropriation not assented to by buyer—Property, whether passes—Re-sale by seller before property has passed to buyer, legality of—Proper remedy of seller—Suit for damages.

Property in goods contracted to be sold will not pass to the buyer under s. 83 of the Contract Act by a subsequent appropriation by the seller unless such appropriation is assented to by the buyer. [p. 60, col. 2.]

A seller has no right to re-sell and claim from the buyer the difference between the contract price and the price fetched on re-sale under s. 107 of the Contract Act where the property in the goods has not passed to the buyer. The only remedy of the seller in such a case is to sue for compensation for breach of contract and the measure of that compensation would have to be based on the difference between the market price at the time of breach and the price agreed upon. JUDGMENT.

Fforde, J.—By a contract in writing, dated the 14th April, 1920, the plaintiff firm agreed to sell and the defendant firm agreed to buy four cases of dyed brocade of the office of D. Raushan Lal at the rate of 22½ pence per yard. Each piece was to contain from 50 to 55 yards and each case was to contain 40 pieces. The sellers were to receive Rs. 200 per case as profit from the buyers. If there were more or less pieces in a case the profit was to be adjusted accordingly. The shipments are described as of May-June. The plaintiffs duly notified the expected arrival of the goods by letter dated the 22nd July, 1920. In this letter the plaintiffs stated that interest would commence to run from the arrival of the steamer in Karachi. This notice was headed: "Dyed brocade quality 0076 sold to you 4 cases May-June, 1920 at Rs. 250 per case profit each containing 50 pieces;" and the numbers of the cases were then given as 204—206 and 208. This is the first piece of correspondence which took place in connection with this transaction. The defendants' reply is dated the 27th July, 1920, in which they say that before dealing with the letter of the plaintiffs of the 22nd, they would like to know what was the date of the Bill of Lading. They also asked for the original design and shades of the goods, and they further raised the point that the profit on each case was to have been Rs. 200, and not Rs. 250. In reply to the letter the plaintiffs wrote on the 29th July, 1920, explaining the method in which the profit was calculated, stating that the relative sample had been sent them by registered post, and ending up by pointing out that the Bill of Lading was not material as there was nothing stated in respect thereof in the particular contract between the parties. The defendants then by letter of the 30th of July pointed out that instead of supplying one design the plaintiffs had supplied five designs which the defendants refused to accept. They also repeated that it was important that they should have the Bill of Lading as otherwise they could not be certain that the goods were not of a late shipment.

There was no further correspondence until the 3rd of September, 1920, when the plaintiffs wrote to say that they had enquired from their shippers and had ascertained that the goods in question were shipped at the right time. In answer to this the defendants referred the plaintiffs to their letter of the 30th of July, to which they said they had nothing further to add. They concluded by saying that they would not pursue the correspondence on the matter any further as the plaintiffs themselves had cancelled the contract in the defendants' office. To this letter the plaintiffs replied on the following day, denying that the contract had ever been cancelled and claiming Rs. 1,000, this sum being made up of profit on the four cases and interest from the date of the arrival of the steamer at Karachi. On the same date the defendants replied acknowledging receipt of the plaintiffs' letter, referring the plaintiffs to their own letter of the previous date, and stating that they had nothing more to add, and that any further correspondence on the subject would not be replied to. In spite of this intimation from the defendants the plaintiffs again wrote on the 30th of September informing the defendants that Railway receipts

To this last letter there was no reply, and the parties are agreed that, so far as the defendants were concerned, they had repudiated the contract before the time fixed for performance. The plaintiffs' Counsel states, as indeed the correspondence shows, that the plaintiffs had not accepted the repudiation of the contract but were keeping it alive and insisted upon performance in due course. According to the plaintiffs' Counsel the date for acceptance was not later than the 1st of October, 1920. That being so, the plaintiffs upon the defendants' refusal to accept delivery should have brought their suit for damages for breach of contract based upon the difference between the market price obtaining at the date of the breach and the contract price. Instead of taking this course the plaintiffs did nothing further after the letter of the 30th September until the 29th of December, when they sent a notice to the defendants informing them that if they did not take delivery of the goods within one week the four cases would be sold by auction on the expiry of that period, and the defendants would be held liable for all expenses incurred. In reply to this notice the defendants wrote on the 30th of December pointing out that two out of the four cases were received late, the contract concerning them was cancelled, and that, as regards the remaining goods, neither the design nor the colour nor the floral design was in accordance with the sample; they stated that the goods could not be thrust upon them, and concluded by saying that if any steps were taken against them they would hold the plaintiffs liable for costs and damages. This letter is merely a repetition of the defendants' previous refusal to perform their part of the contract. Eventually on the 17th of January the four cases in question were handed to the auctioneer to be sold by public auction and were sold on the 25th of January, realising the sum of Rs. 6,192-13. On the 8th of February, 1921, the plaintiffs brought the present suit for recovery of Rs. 6,896 10-0 damages based on the difference between the price realised for the goods at the auction sale and the contract price with interest added thereto. The trial Court gave the plaintiffs a decree for practically the amount claimed.

The defendants' main case is that the plaintiffs have not shown that they suffered any damage by reason of the defendants' breach of their contract. Mr. Moti Sagar has argued that as there was no consent by the defendants to the appropriation by the plaintiffs of the four cases in question to the contract, the property in the goods did not pass and, accordingly, that the measure of damage provided by s. 107 of the Indian Contract Act is not the proper measure in this case. It has been argued by Mr. Puri for the plaintiffs that the contract in question must be read with the contract entered into between the plaintiffs and their importers Messrs. D. Raushan Lal, and that in that contract there being a clause of re-sale upon default of the purchasers to accept delivery, that clause must be read into the present contract, and in the alternative he argues that even if this contract between the plaintiffs and their importers cannot be read into the contract between the present parties the property in the goods in question passed to the defendants under s. 83 of the Indian Contract Act, inasmuch as, according to him, there was an appropriation of these goods to the contract by the plaintiffs and assent to the appropriation by the defendants. Mr. Puri, however, has not been able to point to any act by the defendants amounting to an assent to the appropriation by the plaintiffs. He relied upon the correspondence, which in my opinion does not evidence any such assent. I am, moreover, satisfied that the contract between the plaintiffs and their importers has not been incorporated into the contract of the 14th of April, 1920. This could only be done either by express terms embodied in the agreement of the 14th April, or by necessary implication from the conduct of the parties and their statements on the subject or by the established usage of the trade. In my opinion neither by the terms of the document of the 14th April, nor by necessary implication, nor by the custom of merchants can the terms of the contract between the plaintiffs and their sellers be read into the agreement of the 14th April.

Accordingly the plaintiffs had no right to re sell by agreement, and the property in the goods not having passed to the buyer, there was no right of re-sale under s. 107 of the Indian Contract Act. That being so their only cause of action would be for compensation for breach of contract, and the measure of that damage would have to be based upon the difference between the market rates of the goods in question at the time of the breach and the price agreed upon by the parties. The plaintiffs have not produced any evidence as to the price prevailing in the market at the time of the breach, which the plaintiffs allege occurred between the 30th of September and 1st of October. In this view of the case I do not think it is necessary to discuss the further question which would arise had the plaintiffs a right to measure their damage on the basis provided by s. 107 of the Indian Contract Act. I may mention, however that although the time for performance of the contract was the 30th of September, 1920, the sale did not take place until the 25th of January, 1921. Had there been in the plaintiffs a right of re-sale arising from contract or under the Statute, the further question would have had to have been decided as to whether or not that right was exercised within a reasonable time from the date at which the defendants ought to have accepted delivery of the goods. This matter, however, in view of the conclusion I have come to it, is not necessary to pursue.

For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to establish that they have sustained any damage of the defendants' breach of their contract and the appeal must accordingly be accepted, the decree of the trial Court set aside and judgment entered for the defendants dismissing the suit with costs.

Campbell, J.—I agree.

Mr. R. Ramachandra Chetty, for the Appellant.

Mr. V. Varadaraja Mudaliar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—S.M.K. Mohamad Rowther was adjudicated insolvent on 31st March, 1924, on a petition filed on 17th March, 1924, by a creditor Chengalveraya Chettiar. The Official Assignee of Madras applied to have a sale-deed, dated the 27th October, 1923, and a deed of transfer of mortgage, dated 11th November, 1923, executed by the insolvent in favour of the garnishee (S. M. Sheik Mohideen Rowther) declared void under s. 55, or in the alternative under s. 56, of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. The learned Judge having dismissed the application, the Official Assignee has preferred this appeal.

The insolvent was carrying on business as a commission agent at Madras. He had a branch shop in Tinnevely. In 1923 the insolvent was largely indebted. He was indebted to the garnishee to the extent of about Rs. 20,000 in May, 1923, and he had executed in favour of Chengalvaray Chettiar a promissory note on 1st October, 1923, for Rs. 30,000 the amount having been advanced to the insolvent between 25th June, and 30th September, 1923. The garnishee is the paternal uncle of the insolvent and the sale-deed, Ex. IV, executed by the insolvent in favour of the garnishee comprised all the immoveable properties of the insolvent. It was also alleged that the properties comprised in the sale-deed were worth very much more than Rs. 10,000 the consideration mentioned in the sale-deed. Under Ex. V, dated 11th November, 1923, the insolvent transferred for Rs. 775 to the garnishee the mortgage rights of the insolvent in certain immoveable properties in Tinnevely, the principal amount of the mortgage being Rs. 500. It was also alleged that Ex. IV was not executed on the date it bears (27th October, 1923) but that it was executed only about the 20th December, 1923, the date of registration; finally it was alleged that the garnishee was aware of the insolvent's indebtedness to Chengalvaraya Chettiar and others and that Ex. IV was taken with full knowledge of the fact that it comprised all the properties of the insolvent and that the same was a fraudulent transaction and void as against the Official Assignee. The learned Judge in dismissing the application concluded his judgment as follows:—"The Official Assignee has not in my view discharged the burden on him of showing that the sale was not bona fide; it clearly was, in my view, for valuable consideration and the only way in which the bona fide of the transaction might have been impeached was by showing that for some reason or other the execution of the sale-deed was not on the date it bears. That as I have said the Official Assignee has failed to prove. The Official Assignee having failed to show that the sale was not for valuable consideration and that it was not bona fide, this application must be dismissed with costs."

On behalf of the appellant the following main contentions were raised by his learned Counsel:—

1. That the deed of sale was not executed at Pettai a suburb of Tinnevely on 27th October, 1923, the date mentioned in the document but that it was antedated and executed only about the time of its registration at Tinnevely on 20th December, 1923.

2. The consideration mentioned in the document Rs. 10,000 is grossly inadequate; the properties being really worth about Rs. 20,000.

3. The amount due to the garnishee at the time was only about Rs. 7,000 and the recital in the document that more than Rs. 10,000 was due to the garnishee from the insolvent at the time is false and fraudulent.

4. That the document, Ex. IV, could not be said to have been executed in good faith and consequently the transaction is void as against the Official Assignee, under s. 55 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act.

5. That the case is also one of fraudulent preference coming within s. 55 of the Act and consequently the transfer is void as against the Official Assignee.

Before discussing the questions raised by the appellant it would be convenient to state that the onus of proving that a particular transfer effected by the insolvent is void against the Official Assignee under s. 56 of the Act is on the Official Assignee, whereas the onus of proving good faith and valuable consideration in a case coming under s. 55 would be on the garnishee. This was admitted before us by the learned Counsel on either side appearing in the case, and we think the decision of this Court reported as Official Assignee of Madras v. Sambanda Mudaliar (1), and the Calcutta High Court reported as Nripendra Nath Shahoo v. Ashutosh Ghosh (2) and Nilmoni Chowdhuri v. Basanta Kumar Banerjee (3) and Official Assignee of Bengal v. Yokohama Specie Bank, Ltd., (4) fully support the position.

Before discussing the evidence in the case we should mention that the insolvent died in January, 1924, without filing any schedule of assets and liabilities. His account-books have not been produced. Kadir Mohideen Rowther the fourth witness examined on behalf of the Official Assignee was formerly a gumashta of the insolvent. He has deposed that the garnishee is the heir of the insolvent and that all the accounts of the insolvent had been handed over to the garnishee. The garnishee was examined by a commissioner in Tinnevely, as also his witnesses including an attester to Ex. IV, and the garnishee's accountants Sebastian Pillai and Velayudan Pillai. Under ordinary circumstances the garnishee as well as his accountants, though residents of Tinnevely, would have to be examined in Court in Madras which would have been more satisfactory than their examination by a Commissioner at Tinnevely. It would appear that applications were made to the High Court first to have some witnesses (other than the garnishee and his accountants) examined on commission and subsequently for similar examination of the accountants and the garnishee also. None of the witnesses examined by the Commissioner at Tinnevely were cross-examined on behalf of the Official Assignee—the Official Assignee not having succeeded in his attempts to have the proceedings before the Commissioner adjourned. On the 24th of December, 1925, the Commissioner sent a registered notice to the Official Assignee appointing 2nd January, 1926, for examination of the witnesses. The Christmas holidays intervened and though the Official Assignee wired to the Commissioner on 28th December, 1925, to postpone the enquiry, the Commissioner replied by wire on 30th December, 1925, that as the time for return of the commission was 4th January he adjourned the inquiry to 4th January, 1926, and the District Munsif ordered extension only for the examination of the garnishee till 9th January, 1926. Thus only the garnishee was cross-examined on behalf of the Official Assignee before the Commissioner. In the circumstances one is not surprised to find gaps in the evidence and there are circumstances appearing in the case on which more light could probably have been thrown had the garnishee and his accountants been examined before the learned Judge in Madras. These circumstances have to be kept in view in discussing the evidence adduced in the case.

The first question is whether the sale-deed, Ex. IV, was executed on the date it bears—that is on 27th October, 1923.

[After discussing the evidence their Lordships came to the conclusion that Ex. IV was not executed on the 27th October, 1923, but was antedated and proceeded as follows:—]

As regards the 2nd and 3rd points, namely, the value of the properties covered by Ex. IV, and re-payment of Rs. 15,000 to the garnishee by the insolvent, we are not satisfied that the appellant has proved his contentions on these heads though having regard to the fact that on 15th June, 1921, the garnishee was prepared to take properties covered by the First and Second Schedules only of Ex. IV, as security for Rs. 10,000, and seeing that the value of the properties covered by Third Schedule of Ex. IV is about Rs. 2,400, it is possible that the properties included in Ex. IV were worth more than

Rs. 10,000 in 1923. But the evidence on record is not definite enough for us to say that the price of Rs. 10,000 mentioned in Ex. IV is grossly inadequate. It does not seem that this portion of the case as regards valuation of the property was properly pressed before the learned Judge. Otherwise it is difficult to understand the following observation of the learned Judge: "The evidence on behalf of the garnishee is evidence taken on commission and it goes to show that the property was worth at least equal to the consideration set out in the sale-deed and this evidence has not been contradicted in any way". Exhibit VI is not referred to by the learned Judge in his judgment. As regards the re-payment of Rs. 15,000 it is spoken to only by Kadir Mohideen Rowther, gumashta of the insolvent; and though having regard to the evidence given by that witness materially in favour of the garnishee in one important respect (we refer to the statement by the witness that Exs. IV and V, were executed on the 11th of November, 1923, which would be more than three months prior to the creditor's petition), it could not be said that the witness was inimical to the garnishee, yet on the whole we are not prepared to differ from the learned Judge on this point. We accordingly find against the appellant on points Nos. 2 and 3 mentioned above.

In the face of the statement made by Kadir Mohideen Rowther that the documents were executed on the 11th of November, 1923, we hold that the Official Assignee is not entitled to relief under s. 56 of the Act, but we hold that he is entitled to the relief that he seeks under s. 55.

The garnishee and the insolvent were near relations, the garnishee being the paternal uncle of the insolvent. The insolvent had a branch shop at Tinnevely where the garnishee was carrying on his own business. Though the garnishee had transactions with the insolvent on a large scale some years previously, the subsequent dealings were only on a comparatively small scale. The garnishee was anxious in 1921 to take security, but did not take steps to complete the security bond Ex. VI, being assured by the insolvent that the amount would be re-paid from the collections of a chit fund. The garnishee admitted that in 1923 on account of certain rumours the garnishee came to know that the insolvent's representations were not true. The garnishee also (Para. 6 of the garnishee's counter-affidavit) admitted that all the properties were included in the sale-deed Ex. IV. Though the garnishee stated in his deposition that he did not ask the insolvent whether he had any liabilities we have no doubt that the garnishee had full knowledge of the insolvent's liabilities at the time. We have found that the document, Ex. IV, was antedated. The garnishee took an assignment not only of all the immoveable properties of the insolvent, including dwelling houses, but he took also an assignment of the mortgage rights possessed by the insolvent in respect of a mortgage for the principal sum of Rs. 500 and interest, (Ex. V). If the garnishee's case about the draft sale-deed is accepted then it is clear that after executing a promissory note to Chengalvaraya Chettiar on 1st October, 1923, for Rs. 30,000 the insolvent agreed to sell all his properties to the garnishee for Rs. 10,000 on the very next day, namely, the 2nd of October. The garnishee's clerk was sent to Madras to gather information about the state of the insolvent's business and it is impossible to believe that the garnishee did not know that the insolvent was heavily indebted in Madras. There is evidence that the insolvent owed moneys to two other creditors in addition to Rs. 30,000 that he owed to Chengalvaraya Chettiar. No doubt, no schedule of assets and liabilities has been filed, the insolvent being dead. In the circumstances of the case we are inclined to think that the garnishee has got possession of the account books of the insolvent and has withheld the production of the same; the said account-books, if produced, would have been of very great use in the decision of this case. When confronted with the question as to whether he would have taken the sale-deed Ex. IV, if he had known that the insolvent was indebted to Chengalvaraya Chettiar in the sum of Rs. 30,000 the garnishee stated that even if he had known that the insolvent had other debts, he would have purchased the property as his debts should be realised. We hold that the garnishee knew when he took Ex. IV, that the insolvent was indebted to Chengalvaraya Chettiar to the extent of Rs. 30,000 and also to some others and that he (insolvent) had no other properties. Knowing all this the garnishee took an assignment of all the insolvent's properties and antedated the sale-deed knowing full well that what was being done was in fraud of the insolvency law. He cannot be said to have acted in good faith in the circumstances of the case.

The learned Counsel for the respondent argued that the present case does not come under s. 55 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. Under that section any transfer of property not being a transfer made before and in consideration of marriage or made in favour of a purchaser or encumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration shall if the transferor is adjudged insolvent within two years after the date of the transfer be void against the Official Assignee. It will be noticed that it is only in favour of purchasers and encumbrancers in good faith and for valuable consideration that the exception is made. In the present case the respondent has proved valuable consideration, but he has to prove good faith also. The respondent's Counsel argues that the expression 'good faith' in the section means only that the transaction should not be a sham one in which there is a resulting trust in favour of the insolvent, and he contends that as neither of those two objections could be urged in the present case, the transaction is binding on the Official Assignee. We are unable to accept that contention. Absence of good faith could be proved by showing that the transaction was a sham one, or that there was a resulting trust in favour of the insolvent but the same could be proved by other circumstances also. If an insolvent transfers in favour of one of his creditors to whom he owes much more than the debt due to the transferee and the transferee also being fully aware of all the above circumstances and in concert with the insolvent, brings into existence such a transfer deed, and antedates the same, and take such sale-deed for debt due to him without any contemporaneous advance or other promise to help the insolvent to carry on his business, then we have no doubt that the transaction could not be said to have been entered into in good faith, and the same should be held to be void against the Official Assignee under s. 55 of the Act. The cases referred to by the respondent Hakim Lal v. Moosahar Sahu (5) and Musahar Sahu v. Hakim

Lal (6) are cases that were decided under s. 53 of the Transfer of Property Act and not under the Insolvency Act. In fact at page 1015 of 34 Calcutta [Hakim Lal v. Mooshahar Sahu (15)] it is observed as follows:—"It is well-settled that in the absence of a Bankruptcy Act, a debtor may make preference amongst his creditors, even to the extent of transferring all his property to one creditor to the exclusion of the others." Note the words 'In the absence of a Bankruptcy Act.' The Privy Council also in Musahar Sahu v. Hakim Lal (6) makes a similar observation. At page 524* it is said: "As a matter of law their Lordships take it to be clear that in a case in which no consideration of the law of bankruptcy applies, there is nothing to prevent a debtor paying one creditor in full and leaving others, unpaid, although the result may be that the rest of his assets will be insufficient to provide for the payment of the rest of his debts." In fact we have cases arising under the Insolvency Act where it has been held that under similar circumstances the transfer would be void as against the Official Assignee. In Official Assignee of Bengal v. Yokohama Specie Bank, Ltd., (4) Sanderson, C. J. and Buckland, J., held that an assignment executed in favour of one of the creditors of the insolvent of all the properties of the insolvent without any contemporaneous advance was void against the Official Assignee when the transferor was adjudicated insolvent within two years after the date of the transfer. Finding that the transferee had knowledge of the state of affairs of the assignor at the time of the assignment, the Court held that the transfer was not in good faith within the meaning of s. 55 of the Act. Justice Buckland was of opinion that in considering the effect of transactions of such a nature, the facts must be considered in the light of the Law of Bankruptcy, the object of which is to ensure rateable distribution of an insolvent's property among his creditors, and that a transaction which may in other circumstances be free from all taint would become an offence when it is established that it contravenes the Law of Bankruptcy. Justice Buckland, J., further remarked that "though the Bank (transferees) may have acted honestly in the popular sense they cannot be deemed to have acted in good faith within the Law of Insolvency, however honestly they may have endeavoured and thought they were justified in endeavouring to secure the property of the insolvents as security for their own debt." We may also refer in this connection to a passage in the Privy Council decision reported as Khoo Kwat Siew v. Wooi Taik Hwat (7) where Lord Hobhouse observed as follows:—"The well-known rule of law is, that if a trader assigns all his property, except on some substantial contemporaneous payment, or some substantial undertaking to make payment in futuro, that is an act of bankruptcy, and is void against the creditors and the assignee, simply because nothing is left with which to carry on his business, whereas if he receives substantial assistance something is left to carry on the business." In In re Jukes, Ex parte Official Receiver (8) Wright, J., remarks as follows:—"I think it is quite clear that the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy in parting with the whole of his property to one of his creditors to satisfy a past debt. . . . I cannot help thinking that if a creditor . . . takes the whole, or substantially the whole, of the property of his debtor in payment of a past debt, and knowing that there are other creditors, he cannot be said to be acting in good faith." See also Official Assignee of Bombay v. Obla Kuna Muna Sundarachari (9).

The onus of proving good faith, it has been held, is on the transferee. Official Assignee of Madras v. Sambanda Mudaliar (1), Official Assignee of Bengal v. Yokohama Specie Bank, Ltd., (4). It will depend on the circumstance of each case whether good faith has been proved or not. Having regard to the facts found by us in this case, we are of opinion that the transactions impugned in this case were not executed in good faith and we accordingly allow the appeal and declare that the deed of sale dated the 27th October, 1923, Ex. IV, and the deed of transfer, dated 11th November, 1923, (Ex. V) are void against the Official Assignee. The garnishee would be entitled to prove, as a simple creditor, in respect

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 40
—Judgment-debtor under arrest—Grounds for release —'Furnishing security', meaning of.

A judgment-debtor who is arrested and brought before the Court cannot be released under O. XXI, r. 40, Civil Procedure Code, unless the Court is satisfied on proper evidence that he is unable from poverty or other sufficient cause to pay the decree debt.

A Court cannot, therefore, release a judgment-debtor under arrest on the mere statement of his Vakil at the bar that he is possessed of much landed property.

'Furnishing security' in O. XXI, r. 40 (3) of the Civil Procedure Code means furnishing proper security and not any illusory security.

Rule against an order of the Subordinate Judge, Hooghly, dated the 7th March, 1927.

Mr. N. Barwell (with him Babu Manmatha Nath Ray, Junior, on behalf of Babu Hiralal Chakrabarti), for the Petitioner.

Dr. Radhabinode Pal (with him Babus Narayan Chandra Kar and Nirmal Kumar Sen), for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—Having heard the learned Counsel who appeared in support of the Rule and the learned Vakil for the judgment-debtor, we are satisfied that the order made by the Subordinate Judge on the 7th March, 1927, was not in accordance with law. In the first place, there was no evidence before him on which it was possible for him to arrive at the decision that the judgment-debtor was a person, who for any "other sufficient cause" within the meaning O. XXI, r. 40 was unable to pay the amount of the decree. The mere statement made at the Bar to the effect that he was owner of landed property is insufficient for the purpose. In the next place, it was clearly wrong for the learned Subordinate Judge to release the judgment-debtor on his personal security, which was absolutely ineffective. Order XXI, r. 40, sub-r. (3) provides that the Court may release the judgment-debtor on his furnishing security, which means furnishing proper security and not the illusory security with which the learned Subordinate Judge has been satisfied.

We, therefore, set aside this order and direct the judgment-debtor to surrender at once before the Subordinate Judge, Third Court, Hooghly, who will then consider, on proper materials being placed before him, whether he should be committed to Jail or released, and if released, upon what security; the learned Subordinate Judge must comply with the provisions of O. XXI, in the matter of security. We also draw the attention of the Subordinate Judge to the mandatory provisions of s. 55 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We may say here that the learned Vakil for the judgment-debtor states that his client is willing to furnish security.

The opposite party will pay the costs in this Rule to the petitioner.

Appeal from the following decision of Crump, J. under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act

Crump, J.—(April 12, 1927)—As far as r. 561-A of the High Court Rules is concerned, it is obvious that the rule is not intended to decide what amount is payable on the grant of Probate, but is only a rule intended to secure that, as far as may be, whatever may be payable shall be paid at the time when the application first comes to be made. The payment so made is only provisional, and it is conceded that, if the grant of Probate for one cause or other does not come to be made, the petitioner would be entitled to a refund of the amount so deposited. That being so, I cannot see that r. 561-A of the High Court Rules has any bearing on the point before me. That point must, in my judgment, be decided upon the correct interpretation of s. 19-I of the Court Fees Act. That section for the present purposes runs as follows:—

"(1) No order entitling the petitioner to the grant of Probate or Letters of Administration shall be made upon an application for such grant until the petitioner has filed in the Court a valuation of the property in the form set forth in the Third Schedule, and the Court is satisfied that the fee mentioned in No. 11 of the First Schedule has been paid on such valuation."

It seems to be that the question arises for consideration when the grant comes to be made and not until that date. What I have to decide here and now, no grant having yet been made in the present case, is, whether the fee mentioned in No. 11 of the First Schedule has or has not been paid, and seeing what the law is here at the present time as to the fee payable, it appears to me that the answer must clearly be in the negative. I concede that fiscal Statutes should be construed so far as is allowable in favour of the subject. But, holding as I do that the fee is payable upon the grant of Probate and not upon the application for Probate it seems to me clear that the law in force at the date of the grant is the law which must be applied in deciding this matter. I have been referred to a decision of the Calcutta High Court, Thaddeus Nahapiet v. Secretary of State for India (1). In that decision it was apparently held, in similar circumstances, that the petitioner was competent to comply with s. 19-I at the time when he actually made the payment, and as that payment was before the legislation came into force, whereby the rate of fee was raised, he had complied with the requirements of the Statute and was entitled to the grant of Probate without further payment. With all possible deference to the learned Judges who decided that case, it appears to me that it is not a correct view of the matter. I do not see how the petitioner can be said to be competent to comply with the requirements of the section until the time when the obligation imposed by that section comes into effect, that is, when the grant of Probate comes to be made. This being my view of the matter, I must hold that the Testamentary Registrar was correct in this case, and that no grant of Probate can be made until the additional Court-fee has been paid.

Messrs. Mulla and Nadkarni, for the Appellant.

Mr. Kanga, Advocate-General, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Marten, C. J.—This appeal relates to the amount of duty payable under the Court Fees Act, 1870, Art. 11 of Schedule I, as amended by Bombay Act III of 1926, which came into force on April 1, 1926. Stated shortly, the Court-fee in question may be described as Probate duty.

The point at issue between the parties is whether the amount of the duty ought to be calculated at the rate in force under the law as it stood at the date of the petition for Probate, or whether it should be calculated at the higher rate of duty which came into operation before any grant of Probate was made.

The petitioner is the executor of the Will of the deceased Shamdas Hirañand who died on December 3, 1923, and he has paid the sum of Rs. 28,439 for duty at or prior to his petition being presented and filed on

(1) 81 Ind. Cas. 751; 39 C. L. J. 209; A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 987.

February, 24, 1926. If, however, the Amending Act of 1926 applies, then additional duty to the extent of about Rs. 18,861 is payable. A difference having arisen between the Testamentary Registrar and the attorneys for the petitioner as to the payment of this extra amount, the question was eventually referred under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act to Mr. Justice Crump by the directions of myself as Chief Justice. Mr. Justice Crump decided that the amount of duty ought to be calculated in accordance with the Amending Act, and that, therefore, the petitioner ought to pay the additional sum of Rs. 18,861. From this decision, the petitioner now appeals.

There is a preliminary question as to whether an appeal lies. That is because s. 5 refers to the final decision of the Judge so nominated by the Chief Justice. We have, therefore, to decide whether the dispute in question was one coming within the operation of s. 5, and if so whether the decision of Mr. Justice Crump was final under that section within the ordinary meaning of that word, or whether in some way or another, an appeal or revision would lie from his decision.

Now, in the first place, one must get rid of notions of Probate duty derived from English Law and practice. They have little or nothing to do with the question which we have here before us. In England, for instance, the old Probate duty (now included in estate duty) is calculated at the date of the death, and the Courts have jurisdiction to deal with taxation purporting to be levied on His Majesty's subjects. But, in India, under s. 106 (2) of the Government of India Act, 1915, which really embodies the previous law to the same effect:—

"The High Courts have not and may not exercise any original jurisdiction in any matter concerning the revenue, or concerning any act ordered or done in the collection thereof according to the usage and practice of the country or the law for the time being in force."

Consequently, in revenue matters the jurisdiction of the Court is confined within the four corners of some legislation on the subject, and we have no inherent jurisdiction to deal generally with the matter.

A further observation to avoid confusion is, that in India Probate duty is not a duty leviable on the death of all persons alike as is the case in England. It is a duty which, speaking generally, is leviable only in the case of those who seek Probate or Administration. As regards Europeans and, I think, Parsis, the duty may in any event be leviable. But as regards Hindus and Muhammadans, they to a large degree escape the operation of the duty, unless for certain purposes it is incumbent on them to obtain Probate or Letters of Administration from the Court.

Another difference is that unlike the practice in England and unlike the practice on the Original Side, the law under the Court Fees Act as regards the Mofussil Courts is that an ad valorem fee is payable on the institution of the litigation. On the Original Side, there are also certain fees leviable in an ordinary suit, but they are not at all in the same category as those levied at the start of ordinary suits in the mofussil. The result then of the Court Fees Act appears to be that the legislation has treated, what I will shortly call, the Probate duty as if it was a duty payable in respect of a law suit. Bearing then these distinctions in mind, I will now turn to the Act itself.

Section 3 provides:—

"The fees payable for the time being to the clerks and officers...of the High Courts established by Letters Patent,...

or chargeable in each of such Courts under No. 11 of the First...Schedule...shall be collected in manner hereinafter appearing."

Now, the duty we have to deal with here is No. 11 in the First Schedule. I disregard for the moment the Amending Act of 1926. And it is common ground that it is the duty of the Testamentary Registrar on the Original Side,—we are here dealing with a Bombay case,—to collect this duty.

Next, turning to s. 5:—

"When any difference arises between the officer whose duty it is to see that any fee is paid under this Chapter and any suitor or attorney, as to the necessity of paying a fee or the amount thereof, the question shall, when the difference arises in any of the said High Courts, be referred to the Taxing Officer, whose decision thereon shall be final, except when the question is, in his opinion, one of general importance, in which case he shall refer it to the final decision of the Chief Justice of such High Court, or of such Judge of the High Court as the Chief Justice shall appoint either generally or specially in this behalf."

The section following has a somewhat similar provision as regards the Small Causes Courts, which says:—

"When any such difference arises in any of the said Courts of Small Causes, the question shall be referred to the clerk of the Court, whose decision thereon shall be final, except when the question is, in his opinion, one of general importance, in which case he shall refer it to the final decision of the first Judge of such Court."

Now, in the present case, the matter was referred to the Taxing Officer. He treated it as a matter of general importance and consequently referred it to me, and I, under the section, as I have already stated, appointed Mr. Justice Crump to decide it.

Stopping for a moment at the words "final decision" in s. 5, we are of opinion that these words mean what they say. It is the ordinary way of expressing that no further appeal or revision is to lie, and we see no reason why a different meaning should be given to those words here.

In this connection we respectfully agree with the decision of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Balkaran Rai v. Gobind Nath Tewari (2), where Sir John Edge states (page 158*):

"I have consequently come to the conclusion that not only did the Legislature intend that the decision under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act of the Taxing Officer of the High Court, or of the Chief Justice, or the Judge appointed under s. 5, should for all purposes be final, but that the Legislature has been careful to avoid providing or suggesting any means by which such a decision might be questioned. Whether or not such decisions ought to be open to appeal, review or revision is another question as to which I do not feel bound to express an opinion."

So, too, in In the goods of Bhubaneswar Tragunait (3), a decision of the Court of Appeal in Calcutta, Mr. Justice Rankin says (page 877†):—

"I think this involves that the Taxing Officer's decision is a final decision under s. 5 and that in this case the learned Judge had no authority to review it under s. 19-I."

And again he says (page 878*):—

"In my opinion the decision of the Taxing Officer under r. 4 of Ch. XXXV is final by virtue of s. 5 of the Act."

The reference to r. 4 of Ch. XXXV is to the Rules of the Calcutta High Court. In that particular case, on an application for Letters of Administration made by the surviving members of a Mitakshara Hindu joint family regarding properties held by the deceased as the late karta, the Taxing Officer certified that the ad valorem fee prescribed by Sch. I, cl. (2), of the Court Fees Act was not payable. The Chamber Judge overruled that decision. The Appeal Court held that the decision of the Taxing Officer was final and that the Chamber Judge had no authority to review it.

And, indeed, in the present case, we do not understand it to be contended that if the original Act of 1870 had not been amended, and the attorneys had only tendered, say, half the appropriate duty, and that consequently a difference had arisen between them and the Testamentary Registrar on the point, then the decision of the Taxing Officer or the Judge under s. 5 would be otherwise than final. So, too, as we understood from the argument of the appellant, it was conceded that if the present Amending Act of 1926 had been in operation at the death of the testator, then, too, the larger duty would have been payable, and the decision at any rate under s. 5 would be final.

The argument presented to us, as I understand it, was that the present dispute was not really one as to the amount of the duty, but as to what legislation was in force at the material date, and that the main point between the parties was whether the material date would be the date of the presentation of the petition or the date of the actual grant. One may, indeed, put forward a third date, namely, whether it should be the date of the death as in England. But, however that may be, it seems to us that this in any event involves a difference as to the amount of the duty payable. Those words in s. 5 are quite general, and, speaking for myself, I see no reason why they should be cut down and why their ordinary meaning should be confined to differences as to the amount of valuation only.

Consequently, there seems to me a broad distinction between s. 5 and s. 12, to which we were also referred, because s. 12 speaks of "every question relating to valuation for the purpose of determining the amount of any fee chargeable under this Chapter." Questions relating to valuation seem to me to stand on a different footing. Further, in s. 12 (2), there is an express power given to the Court, if it thinks the original decision wrong, to require an additional fee to be paid. In this respect, the legislation somewhat resembles ss. 36 and 61 of the Indian Stamp Act. This distinction is pointed out in the Full Bench case [Balkaran Rai v. Gobind Nath Tiwari (2)] to which I have already alluded, where Sir John Edge says (page 102*):—

"I have no doubt that the term 'final' in s. 5 of the Court Fees Act has precisely the same meaning as the term 'final' in s. 12 of that Act. But the subject to which that term is applied in s. 5 is different from that to which it is applied in s. 12. In s. 5 it is applied to a decision as 'to the necessity of paying a fee or the amount thereof', whereas in s. 12 it is applied to a decision as 'to every question relating to valuation for the purpose of determining the amount of any fee chargeable under the Chapter (Chap. III) on a plaint or memorandum of appeal.' When we come to look into the authorities it will be necessary to keep this distinction in mind."

In these circumstances, we are not here called on to consider the decision of Mr. Justice Mookerjee and Mr. Justice Chotzner in Tara Prasanna Chongdar v. Nrisinha Murari Pal (4) where they held that—

"Where the decision involves root questions of principle as to the nature of a suit it is open to appeal notwithstanding the provisions of s. 12 of the Court Fees Act."

They said (page 223†):—

"We may add finally that this appeal is competent notwithstanding the provision of s. 12 of the Court Fees Act. This is not a case of appraisement or of fixation of value with a view to determine the amount of fee chargeable; the dispute involves root questions of principle as to the nature of the suit and the retrospective operation of Statutes."

That, again, was not a question of Probate duty, but, as to the fees payable in respect of an ordinary suit.

Another decision of the same Bench in Thaddeus Nahapiet v. Secretary of State for India (1) was pressed upon us. But there the Bengal Court Fees Act of 1922 which raised the rate of duty expressly provided that:—

"17. Nothing in this Act shall apply to any Probate, Letters of Administration or certificate in respect of which the fee payable under the law for the time being in force has been paid prior to the commencement of this Act, but which have not issued."

In the corresponding Bombay Amending Act III of 1926 we have no such provision. And, indeed, it does not appear from the statement of that case as to whether there had been any decision by the Taxing Officer or by the Judge under s. 5 of the Act. The decision, as I understand it, was merely given on the merits of the case as to whether the higher duty should be paid. The latter was precluded by the express provision of the Bengal Act.

We were also referred to Ramsekhar Prasad Singh v. Sheonandan Dubey (5) and Krishna Mohan Sinha v. Raghunandan Pandey (6). The latter is a Full Bench case and the former decides that "under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act, 1870, the decision of the Taxing Officer is final, and even if he has done anything which the law does not allow him to do the High Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with his decision as to the amount of the fee." The latter case [Kishna Mohan Sinha v. Raghunandan Pandey (6)] is much to the same effect on this point.

The result is that the authorities, to which we have been referred, substantially support the view which, apart from the authorities, we should be prepared to take of this section. To summarize, then, we think that the dispute in this case was a dispute as to the amount of the fee, and that consequently the case fell within s. 5, and that the decision of the Judge specially appointed in that behalf, namely, Mr. Justice Crump, was final, and that no appeal or revision lies therefrom. Consequently, on that ground alone, it follows that this appeal does not lie.

There is one further observation which may be made, and that is, that if the argument of the appellant was sound, then it would follow that what has been done under s. 5, namely, the reference first to the Taxing Officer and then to the Special Judge, was erroneous, and that neither of them had any jurisdiction to determine this particular matter. Incidentally, I may say that no objection to the jurisdiction under s. 5 was ever taken by the appellant either before the Taxing Officer or before Mr. Justice Crump. It was not until the last decision was given against him that this point was raised. If, then, according to the appellant, the procedure under s. 5, was erroneous, it is difficult to see what right of appeal there can be to this Court. As pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rangoon Botatourg Co., Ltd. v. Collector, Rangoon (7) (page 27*):—

"An appeal does not exist in the nature of things. A right of appeal from any decision of any tribunal must be given by express enactment."

Their Lordships were here citing what Lord Bramwell observed in the case of the Sandback Charity Trustees v. North Staffordshire Ry. Co. (8).

Nor, if we turn to s. 15 of the Letters Patent, would any appeal necessarily lie because the appeal there given is from orders passed in exercise of the original jurisdiction pursuant to s. 13 of the recited Act. And when one turns to the corresponding section in the Government of India Act, 1915, s. 108 (1) refers to the exercise of the original and appellate jurisdictions vested in the Court. But it may be argued that under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act the Court is not really exercising its original or appellate jurisdiction, and that the Judge there appointed by the Chief Justice is more in the nature of persona designata as in the case of the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court in certain matters arising under Municipal elections. In these circumstances, and apart from the use of the words "final decision" in s. 5, we should find great difficulty in any event in dealing with the appeal which is presented to us at this stage. In saying this, I do not overlook the provisions of s. 19-I of the Court Fees Act. But I wish to make it quite clear that Mr. Justice Crump was not sitting as the Testamentary Judge or in exercise of the ordinary testamentary jurisdiction of the High Court. He was sitting on this occasion solely as a Judge specially designated to decide this case under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act. Consequently, there has been no decision of "the Court," so far as I am aware, under s. 19-I. In these circumstances, I need not pursue this particular point.

The result is that this appeal will be dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This appeal arises out of an action in ejectment, and is on behalf of some of the defendants in the Suit No. 55 tried by the Subordinate Judge of Khulna. The facts are these:—There is a Sayedpur Trust Estate, which has got the zemindari interest. A patni was created consisting of certain mouzahs within that estate in 1821 in favour of two persons named Gopi Roy and Kali Roy. Within the patni there was a large tract of jungle and apparently it was not included within any of the mouzahs. In 1843 some of the persons, who held the property in dar-patni interest, executed a lease of about 600 bighas of jungle land under certain terms in favour of two persons, named Ramjiban Jotedar and Ram Sunder Mandal. Sometime after that the patni interest appears to have come into the possession of certain Boses. On the 9th of October, 1879, these Boses granted a lease of 600 bighas of patni and jungle lands excluding 400 bighas of dhap lands in favour of four persons, who may be called Jotedars and Mandals. There was also a stipulation that the 400 bighas excluded, which was described as dhap lands, might be taken possession of by the lessees after reclaiming those lands at a certain rate of rent. The provision with regard to rent was in the usual manner of progressive rent from time to time, and stipulating that the rent would be at a certain rate from the year 1304, that is 1897. This patni was put up to sale under Regulation VIII of 1819 on the 15th of May, 1914, and was purchased by the plaintiffs. After their purchase they served notice on all persons, who were the descendants of the original lessees under the lease of 1879, and all those who had derived title under these lessees or their representatives. A large number of persons was impleaded as defendants. Most of them came to an agreement with the plaintiffs and compromised the suit. The appellants before us fought out the suit in the Court below, and a decree for ejectment has been made as against them.

The case of the plaintiffs was that under the provisions of s. 11 of Regulation VIII of 1819, they were entitled to eject the defendants, and to recover khas possession of the lands in question. Various pleas were taken in defence, but the main defence was that the lessees under the lease of 1879 were khudkasht raiyats and, therefore, protected under the third clause of s. 11 of the Regulation. Secondly, even if it be considered that they were not khudkasht raiyats, they acquired right of occupancy as *raiya*s by holding the lands for more than 12 years, and consequently they are protected from ejectment under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act, notwithstanding the provisions of s. 11 of Regulation VIII of 1819. Another plea was sought to be raised that the plaintiffs had acquired no right by virtue of the Regulation sale, as certain steps were not taken under the Regulation. Besides those pleas, other pleas were taken and a large number of issues was raised in the Court below. It is unnecessary to mention these as they are absolutely immaterial for the purposes of the appeal. The Subordinate Judge held that the defendants were not khudkasht raiyats. Secondly, he held that not being khudkasht raiyats, they are liable to ejectment, as cl. 3 of s. 11 of the Regulation does not protect them. He further held that the defendants were tenure holders, and their interest was an incumbrance coming under the first clause of s. 11 of the Regulation, and, therefore, they have no right to remain on the land after the patni sale. He also held that the defendants could not challenge the validity of the patni sale collaterally by way of defence in the present suit. On these findings he made his decree in ejectment. Twelve of the defendants have appealed to this Court. One of them, defendant No. 18, is one of the representatives of the original lessees under the lease of 1879. Others claimed under various sub-leases from the lessees or from the sub-lessees under those lessees. It is unnecessary for our purpose to state the origin of the title of those subordinate holders.

Three main questions have been argued on behalf of the appellants before us. It is stated, firstly, that the predecessors of defendant No. 18 were khudkasht raiyats and the lease being a bona fide lease in their favour the plaintiffs are not entitled to eject him, and consequently the plaintiffs are not entitled to eject the tenants holding under rights subordinate to the lessees under the lease of 1879. The second point was that the defendants have, by their cultivation of the lands, themselves acquired occupancy rights under Act X of 1859 as well as under the Bengal Tenancy Act and are, therefore, not liable to be ejected. The third point taken was that the Collector had no jurisdiction to sell the patni under Regulation VIII of 1819 on account of certain circumstances, one of which was that he was the Manager of the Sayedpur Trust Estate.

The third point may be taken up first and disposed of, on the ground that this plea was not taken in the lower Court, nor does it appear in the issues raised in that Court. The question not having been discussed in the lower Court, we are not inclined to allow that question to be raised for the first time in this Court. The other facts upon which they rely as to the invalidity of the sale are not such as would make the sale void, and, therefore, in my judgment there is no substance in that point raised.

As regards the second point, the Subordinate Judge seems to have been of opinion that even if the defendants had acquired the right of occupancy under the Bengal Tenancy Act they were liable to be ejected under the provisions of s. 11 of Regulation VIII of 1819. His view apparently was that under the third clause of that section, only khudkasht raiyats or resident and hereditary cultivators are protected, and whoever does not come within the description of that class of *raiya*ts, is liable to be ejected at the instance of a purchaser at a patni sale. He apparently relies in support of that contention on the case of Jogeshwar Mazumdar v. Abed Mahomed Sirkar (1). In my judgment that view of the Subordinate Judge is erroneous. Apart from authority, if the third clause of s. 11 is examined, it will be apparent that it only provides certain restrictions on the right of an auction-purchaser to eject certain persons, which right has been given by the previous clauses of that section. Under the first clause certain incumbrances, which had accrued upon the taluk, were liable to be cancelled. The second clause deals with leases creative of a middle interest between the resident-cultivator and the late proprietor, and the third clause mentions an exception to the right of the purchaser. If the right of the person in occupation does not come within the first or the second clause of that section, and if the occupier of the land is protected from ejectment by some other law, there is no reason to suppose that s. 11 of the Regulation gives authority to the auction-purchaser to eject that occupier of the land by virtue of his purchase. The case of Jogeshwar Mazumdar v. Abed Mahomed Sirkar (1) can only be reasonably construed as an authority for the proposition that a lease is an incumbrance. If it be construed as an authority for laying down the proposition that even an occupancy *raiya*t is liable to be ejected by an auction-purchaser because he does not come within cl. 3 of s. 11 of the Regulation, with all respect I must say that I am unable to accept that proposition. That case has been interpreted and doubted in various other cases. See Prodyote Kumar Tagore v. Rakhal Chandra Sarkar (2), Tamiz-ud din Khan v. Khoda Nawaz Khan (3) and also the case of Bama Charan Gosain v. Ram Kanai Dubey (4). In the last case, the learned Judges observed that the case of Jogeshwar Mazumdar v. Abed Mahomed Sirkar (1) did not lay down that an occupancy right is an incumbrance, and, as a matter of fact, it could not have been so laid down as an incumbrance as contemplated in the first clause of s. 11 of the Regulation. There is ample authority for the proposition that the proviso in the third clause does not mean that persons in occupation not coming within the definition of *khudkasht raiya*ts, are liable to be ejected, even if they have acquired occupancy rights under the tenancy law. I have not been able to find any authority with regard to patni sales, but the cases with reference to s. 16 of Act VIII of 1865, where the proviso is in the same terms as the proviso in the third clause of s. 11 of Regulation VIII of 1819, support the proposition. Those cases are Pureeag Singh v. Purtaap Narain Singh (5), Nil Madhub Kurmakar v. Shiboo Paul (6), Emam Ali Mestory v. Ator Ali Khan (7) and Bama Charan Gosain v. Ram Kana Dubey (4).

The second proposition, therefore, on behalf of the appellants ought to be accepted. But the question is whether the defendants had acquired a right of occupancy by remaining in possession of the disputed land for the requisite period under the Bengal Tenancy Act. It is not necessary for me to examine the evidence or the terms of the lease in detail having regard to the view I have taken with regard to the first question. The learned Advocate for the respondents has argued with considerable stress, that the lease of 1879 was the grant of a tenure and if the lessees were tenure-holders they could not under the provisions of the law, acquire a right of occupancy as raiyats with regard to lands which they had themselves cultivated within their own tenure. That proposition seems to me to be unassailable. It is unnecessary for me to discuss the question whether the lease should be construed as the grant of a tenure or whether it should be considered as a mere raiyati lease, as is contended for equally strenuously on behalf of the appellants by their learned Advocate. It is sufficient for my purpose to state that these lessees were illiterate people and actual cultivators themselves. They belong to the caste of Pode, one of that class of people who are considered to be untouchables. It can hardly be supposed that they were to act the part of landlords or tenure-holders. The only point that can be urged against their being raiyats is that the area of the demised premises exceeds by far 100 bighas of land.

I next come to the first point urged, and it is this, that the defendants are khudkasht raiyats. The Subordinate Judge has found that the appellants have no dwelling house within the village in which the lands in question are situate. His finding is that some of them have got more chalias where they stayed during the time of cultivation.

He further relies upon the vakalatnamas filed by some of these defendants in which their residences have been described as in another village. He, therefore, does not believe the evidence given by the defendants' witnesses, that they are resident hereditary cultivators. I may mention that the descriptions in the vakalatnamas do not amount to anything. These people are illiterate. Their vakalatnamas must have been written by the clerks of their Pleaders, and the clerks of their Pleaders must have written their residence from the copy of the summons that was served upon the defendants, and their residence in the copy of the summons must have been taken from the plaint in which the plaintiffs chose to describe the defendants as being residents of a different village. That being so, the only evidence that remains is the evidence of those defendants as to their place of residence. But that also is not decisive of the question, because at the time when the lease was granted it was not known within which village the jungle land was situate. In the description of the property in the lease of 1879, it was described as in Mouzah Sahapur Bil, where the details of the kisti-bundi as regards the payment of rent was given. In the schedule of boundaries it is described as in the Bil south-west of Ramkrishnapur Ghona, within Taraf Sahapur. In para. 4 of the plaint the plaintiffs described it as situated on the south of the Thak Map that was prepared with respect to Ramkrishnapur and Ghona Mouzahs jointly. From this it appears that the property was not actually situated within the village of Ramkrishnapur or Ghona. The lessees in 1879 were all residents of Ruprampur and Madhavakti, which villages, it appears, are within the patni mahal which has been purchased by the plaintiffs at the auction-sale. What is the meaning of khudkasht raiyats? It is resident, hereditary cultivator in contradistinction to paikasht raiyat, that is a migratory tenant. If the tenants were resident within the patni mahal but outside the jungle tract, which did not form part of any village, and where no man could live,—and it is in evidence that the land in question was at that time infested with tigers and other wild animals—would it be reasonable to say that these tenants were not khudkasht tenants although they were residents of contiguous villages within the patni? I think not. There is ample evidence on the record to show that these jotedars and Mandals were rai-yats of the villages in which they lived, and as I have already stated, they belong to a class whose only mode of life is by cultivation. That these men may be considered to be khudkasht rai-yats is supported by the observations of Mr. Justice Markby in the case of Nubokishore Biswas v. Jadub Chunder Sircar (8). I may state in passing that the Subordinate Judge is clearly wrong in observing that that case was not followed in the later cases mentioned by him. Now, if the tenants to whom the lease was given in 1879 were khudkasht rai-yats, then their case falls within the third clause of s. 11 of the Patni Regulation; and that clause lays down that the purchaser is not entitled to eject the khudkasht rai-yats, nor to cancel bona fide engagements made with such tenants by the late incumbent, except it be proved in a regular suit to be brought by such purchaser for the adjustment of his rent, that a higher rate would have been demandable at the time such engagements were contracted by his predecessor. Now the only ground on which the plaintiffs might bring this action, as it seems to me, is that this was not a bona fide engagement. That has not been stated in the plaint, and having regard to the nature of the land, which was absolutely jungle and the purpose for which the lease was granted, that is, for the purpose of reclaiming by these people, who were residents of villages close by, it can hardly be said that it was not a bona fide lease given to the lessees by the then patnidars. No attempt has been made to show that the rent then fixed was not the proper rent demandable. The representatives of the lessees under the lease of 1879 cannot, therefore, be ejected by the plaintiffs, and consequently the persons claiming under them or their representatives are also not liable to be ejected. In this view as I have already stated, it is unnecessary for me to determine whether the lease created a tenure or a rai-yati interest. Whether it is an incumbrance falling within the first clause of the section or not, need not also be determined having regard to my finding that the lessees were khudkasht rai-yats and the lease was a bona fide lease for the purpose of reclaiming jungle lands.

The result, therefore, is that this appeal must be allowed, and the suit for ejectment against these defendants-appellants must be dismissed with costs.

The costs in this Court will be given to the appellants other than appellants Nos. 8, 9 and 12.

The applications are not pressed and are dismissed without costs.

Roy, J.—I agree.

Administration suit—Appeal from order on Commissioner's report—Motion for interim distribution—Proper Court.

A motion for interim management or distribution of the estate in an administration suit should be made to the Court of first instance and not to the Appellate Court, where the Appeal Court is not seized of the whole suit but is seized only of certain exceptions to the Commissioner's report in the case. [p. 76, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Rangnekar.

FACTS.—Pending an appeal from an order passed by the trial Court on certain exceptions taken by a party to the Commissioner's report in an administration suit, one of the parties took out summons asking for Rs. 1,000 or Rs. 1,500 to be given to him on account of his share. The trial Court dismissed it holding that the matter was one for the Appellate Court and not for it to decide. The applicant appealed.

Mr. Munshi, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mulla, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—A question of practice arises on this motion as to whether the present application should be made before the Chamber Judge or before the Appellate Court. An application has already been made to the Chamber Judge, which he has refused. The applicant now comes direct to the Court of Appeal by way of motion.

* * * * *

Now it is important to observe that the Appeal Court is not seized of the whole administration suit. It is only seized in appeal of certain exceptions to the Commissioner's report, and those only. Therefore for the time being it has nothing whatever to do with any order that may be made for the interim management or the distribution of the estate. With great respect to the learned Chamber Judge we think he must have overlooked this circumstance, and I regret that we have not got the advantage of knowing the reasons for his judgment.

In our opinion this present question does not arise in this appeal. We are not seized of it, and it is most inconvenient to have ordinary Chamber matters brought not before the Chamber Judge in whose province they properly fall, but before a Bench of two Judges in open Court. This Court has already in Ladkavahoo v. Charundas Chaturbhuj (1) drawn attention to the fact that in an ordinary administration suit, even if at some phase of the case the matter has been before the Appeal Court, all future applications with regard to the administration of the estate should in general come before the Judge of first instance in the ordinary way. It is true that in the present case there is a pending appeal, but as I have already pointed out, the only appeal before us is as regards the exceptions. As regards what the Chamber Judge has to decide, he is in just as good a position as we are to consider whether on the figures before the Court the proposed advance will be a safe one to make. We cannot, of course, say what the result of the appeal itself will eventually be any more than he can. It is really a question of figures as to whether the present order asked for can be appropriately made.

When the above was pointed out to Counsel there was substantially no contention that what I have above indicated was other than the proper course. Indeed a technical objection was taken by the Counsel for the respondents that the present application to us did not lie at all.

Under these circumstances we will direct the present notice of motion to be treated as a summons before the Chamber Judge and laid before him for disposal as Chamber Judge. He will accordingly deal with the costs of this motion, as well as of the costs of the original Chamber summons which he reserved.

The fact that certain property was purchased in the name of a minor son of a Muhammadan with money taken from the father's estate after his death would not make the property so purchased the common property of the family. [ibid.]

It is not proper to apply the principles governing the Hindu joint family system to a Muhammadan family. [ibid.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Ganjam, in A. S. No. 323 of 1920, preferred against that of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Berhampore, in O. S. No. 69 of 1915.

Mr. B. Jagannatha Doss, for the Appellants.

Mr. P. Venkataramana Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The first point urged in this second appeal is that the lower Courts were wrong in re-trying the whole case as the judgment of the High Court cannot be said to have upset the concurrent findings of two Courts. This contention is untenable in view of the clear wording of the judgment of the High Court "as the discussion on the question of adverse possession has proceeded on a wrong view of the law, we think the safe course is to reverse the judgments of the Courts below and remand the suit to the Court of first instance for disposal in the light of our observations."

It is clear from this point that the learned Judges who decided the second appeal set aside the judgments of both the lower Courts and directed the case to be re-tried.

The next point urged is that the purchase in the name of one brother was for the benefit of the whole family and the property purchased should not be considered as the sole property of the person in whose name the sale was taken. As the learned

Judge observes, it is not proper to apply the principles governing the Hindu joint family system to a Muhammadan family. The plaintiff and the 1st defendant are brother and sister. Their father died in 1878. Then there were other children of the father living. The children were minors and their paternal uncle managed the property on their behalf. He purchased some property in the name of the 1st defendant. Items Nos. 4, 8 and 9 were purchased so far back as 1881, 1880 and 1879, respectively. The contention of Mr. Jagannatha Das is that inasmuch as the property was purchased in the name of a minor, it must be taken to have been purchased for the benefit of the whole family. Children in a Muhammadan family are not co-owners in the sense that what is purchased by one person enures for the benefit of another. There is some evidence that some cash was left by the father and a portion of it was utilised for the purchase in the 1st defendant's name. So far as the amount taken from the general estate was concerned the 1st defendant had to give credit for that amount. If the 1st defendant had taken money and wasted it, or if he had purchased any trinket or trifle, it cannot be said that he purchased it for the benefit of the family. When accounts are taken the family would be entitled to debit against him the amounts he had taken. The fact that the property was purchased by him with money taken from the father's estate would not make the property the common property of the family. The judgment of the District Judge is correct, and the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

There is no question of law in the memorandum of objections. The learned Judge's finding is supported by the evidence on record. The memorandum of objections is dismissed with costs.

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 73—Rateable distribution—Money paid by defendant to avoid attachment before judgment—Attachment by other creditors, effect of—Plaintiff's right to entire amount.

Where money is paid to the credit of a suit or earmarked for a suit, the money belongs to the plaintiff in the event of his success and cannot pass to the general creditors of the person who pays it in or to any persons who claim under him. [p. 78, col. 2; p. 79, col. 1.]

A instituted a suit against B and applied for attachment before judgment of an amount due to B. The order of attachment was issued in a wrong form containing neither an order to furnish security nor a direction to pay the money into Court. B, however, paid the money into Court and did not contest the suit. Various creditors of B attached this money in Court before A obtained his decree, and the amount was rateably distributed:

Held, that the money having been paid towards satisfaction of A's claim in order to avoid an attachment before judgment, A was entitled to have it paid out to him on an application without taking out execution of his decree and the other attaching creditors were not entitled to rateable distribution. [p. 78, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the judgment of the District Judge, Mandalay.

Mr. A. C. Mukerjee, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. Mukerjee, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In Civil Regular Suit No. 313 of 1926 of the Sub-Divisional Court of Mandalay, Maganlal Parbhuram sued Maung San Lon for Rs. 1,593.12 principal and interest on a promissory note.

On the 31st July, 1926, plaintiff applied for attachment before judgment of a sum sufficient to satisfy the decree, from the price of a house due by one Charan Das to the defendant, and for a prohibitory order restraining the defendant from receiving the amount.

An attachment order was issued, in wholly wrong form, to defendant and Charan Das jointly, directing them to hold the sum of Rs. 1,790.12 subject to the further orders of the Court. On the order being served, defendant paid up the sum of Rs. 1,790.12 and the Bailiff returned the warrant with an endorsement that it had been duly executed (vide Civil).

Miscellaneous No. 57 of 1926 of the Sub-Divisional Court).

Whilst the money was still in Court various creditors attached it before judgment. Plaintiff obtained an ex parte decree on the 12th August and applied for payment of the money paid into Court by defendant. Objections were made and ultimately the money was distributed rateably between various decree-holders. Plaintiff then in Suit No. 452 of 1926 of the same Court sued for a declaration that the sum of Rs. 1,790-12 held in Court to the credit of his Suit No. 313, was not liable to rateable distribution and that plaintiff alone was entitled thereto. His suit was dismissed.

Both the lower Courts have held that the money was attached before judgment and that, before plaintiff had any fair lien. Their findings are undoubtedly correct on the assumption that the money in question was attached before judgment; but it seems clear to me that the money was not attached. As I have already pointed out the order of attachment was in wrong form.

There was no order to furnish security, as there should have been under O. XXXVIII, r. 5, and none was asked; neither was there any direction to pay the money into Court. Instead of holding the money at the disposal of the Court as directed defendant paid the money into Court. He never contested the suit. It is obvious, therefore, that the money was paid towards satisfaction of plaintiff's claim and in order to avoid an attachment before judgment. None of the conditions necessary to constitute an attachment under O. XXXVIII, r. 5, have been complied with.

The money must be considered as a deposit in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim under O. XXIV, r. 1, and plaintiff was entitled to have it paid out to him in satisfaction of his claim on application without taking out execution of his decree. As soon as it was paid to the Bailiff the money ceased to be an asset in the hands of the defendant.

It must be taken as settled law that under the circumstances plaintiff had a fair lien on the money and it was not liable to rateable distribution. There is a wealth of case-law on the subject both English and Indian. It is only necessary to refer to two Indian cases. In Sorabji

Coovarji v. Kala Raghunath (1) the immoveable property of a judgment-debtor was attached at the instance of two judgment-creditors, and his other judgment-creditors merely put in applications for execution without attaching.

On the day fixed for sale of the property the decrees of the two attaching judgment-creditors were satisfied by payment in Court of the decretal amounts, and the effect was the withdrawal of the attachment under O. XXI, r. 55.

On the day following the payment into Court on an ex parte application an order was made for rateable distribution of the money paid into Court.

It was held on appeal by a Bench of the Bombay High Court that the moneys, which were paid in to satisfy the attaching creditors' decrees, and to raise the attachment could not be treated as assets held by the Court and were not distributable among other judgment-creditors who had merely applied for execution.

The facts here are not the same as in the case under appeal, but the principle involved is.

The whole subject is discussed at length in Seena Vana Ramiah Ayyar v. Gopala Ayyar (2) which might almost be called the locus classicus on the point. The facts were that the defendant was arrested before judgment and was ordered to be released from custody on his paying in Court sufficient to meet plaintiff's claim. The money was subsequently attached by a decree-holder and the defendant was adjudicated an insolvent.

It was held by a Bench of the Madras High Court that the money was paid in Court to the general credit of the action and was charged with a lien in favour of the plaintiff on the latter obtaining a decree in his favour. It was further held that the attaching creditors and the Official Receiver's claims were subject to this term.

As Coutts Trotter, J., observed in the course of his judgment:

"Where money is paid to the credit of the suit or earmarked for the suit the Courts have always held that, when that is done, the money belongs to the plaintiff in the event of his success, and that it cannot pass to the general creditors of the person who pays it in or to any person who claims under him."

(1) 12 Ind. Cas. 911; 36 B. 156; 13 Bom. L. R. 1193.

The case is clearly distinguishable from one in which defendant gives security for his appearance. Such security would be merely conditional for his appearance in Court and would not be earmarked for the purposes of the suit.

Plaintiff was on this view clearly entitled to the declaration sought and to satisfy his decree from the money paid in towards his claim.

I set aside the findings and decrees of the lower Courts and grant plaintiff a decree as prayed with costs throughout.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Father's powers of alienation—Mere benefit, whether sufficient—Deed tying up management of property after death, validity of—Father's power to appoint testamentary guardian.

A Hindu who had only two minor sons executed a deed in favour of the defendant, his brother's son, by which the defendant was to manage his properties both during his lifetime and after his death during the minority of his sons. The defendant was not willing to accept management with the liability of accounting for profits and another deed was executed which was called a Ohalgeni for a term of thirteen years fixed, whereby certain annual payments were to be made, certain fixed sums were to be invested for the minors and the defendant was relieved from liability to account. The minors sued after the death of their father for cancellation of the deed:

JUDGMENT.

Marten, C. J.—This is a suit by minors to set aside two deeds, Exs. 85 and 86, of February 21, and June 25, 1921, executed by their father Mukund in favour of their cousin, Janardhan, defendant No. 1, who is a nephew of Mukund. Shortly stated these deeds are in the nature of management deeds both in the lifetime of Mukund and after his death during the minority of the minors. They also, taken together, confer a personal interest upon Janardhan, inasmuch as although he is to be under liability to account for the corpus, he is not to be liable to account for the income of the property, but is to pay certain expenses and a fixed sum as representing the balance during the minority of the minors. On Mukund's death the minors were young children, and approximately the deeds would operate for a term of some thirteen years. The points of law are whether Mukund had power thus to deal with the family property over this term of years, and in particular to make this provision as regards a fixed lump sum as being payable in lieu of the actual interest. Incidentally a question of law arises as to whether a Hindu father has any power at all to appoint guardians of the property as opposed to the persons, of his minor sons after his death, whether by Will or by deed inter vivos.

I do not propose to deal in any detail with these two deeds. It is sufficient for my purpose to state that at the date when they were executed Mukund had no adult son, but only two minor children besides some five ladies who were dependent on him, viz, his two wives, and a widow of a deceased son, and two daughters. Consequently Janardhan, defendant No. 1, was his nearest male relative and the person whom he naturally might look to for assistance. As regards the two wives, the elder, Janaki, defendant No. 2, had no children. The other one, Saraswati, the mother of the minors, was quite a young woman of about twenty-two or thereabouts. The learned trial Judge has formed a somewhat unfavourable opinion of the latter's business capacity and has drawn our express attention to the fact that her father was a man in embarrassed pecuniary circumstances. It is suggested that it is this father who is largely responsible for the present litigation. It also appears, as is recited in the documents, that Mukund at the time he made them, was in bad health, that he was no longer able to manage the properties himself, and that consequently he brought in his nephew Janardhan to assist him. It may be taken that Mukund was about sixty or sixty-one at the date of these deeds, and that he died in the following year, viz., in May, 1922. We may also note in passing that in between these two deeds he executed a Will on May 10, 1921, but, as the learned Judge points out, that does not affect the question before us.

I mention these facts as they are very naturally relied on as showing that the deeds which Mukund entered into represented a reasonable business arrangement which was one for the benefit of the family and the minors in particular. As regards the first deed, Ex. 85, that was in the nature of a deed of management, and is called a trust deed or power-of-attorney. It says:—"And you are fit to be accepted as my trustee or my constituted attorney. I have, therefore, accepted you are my legal constituted attorney to do the following things, viz., to carry on vahivat from this day on my behalf and on behalf of minors, of all my immoveable and moveable properties or estate and the outstandings mentioned below, excepting some properties kept with me which I shall dispose of in my lifetime or only up to my death, and up to the time my said two sons come of age after my death, in case I die hereafter before the said two sons come of age." Then it deals with the performance of certain religious ceremonies and making payments for the education of the sons. There are provisions for keeping accounts which are to be inspected by a panch and for cultivating the lands, and for paying certain sums for maintenance to the two wives, i.e., Rs. 24 to the senior wife and Rs. 75 to the junior wife for herself and her children, and certain other expenses, and that the balance should be invested in the manner therein mentioned. If the trust is not accepted, then there is to be no objection to the Court taking over the management. The deed then provides: "And having appointed you to do the above things, I have this day given the whole of the estate into your possession." Then it sets out the various particulars including moveables as well as immoveables.

It appears, however, from the next deed, Ex. 86, that Janardhan was not willing to accept the obligations under the earlier document. In particular he objected to the provisions as to accounting for the income and so on. Consequently, the nature of the deed of management was altered in very material particulars by the second deed, Ex. 86, which is headed: "Chalgeni deed in respect of immoveable and moveable properties for a term of thirteen years, value in respect of this is Rs. 1,409-12-7, the assessment in respect of this should be paid by the owner only." Then the document provides that Mukund gives this Chalgeni deed for a term of thirteen years as follows. The provisions which follow amount in effect to this. It is estimated that the profits or the income of the property will amount to roughly Rs. 1,409 a year. It is estimated that the expenses including maintenance etc., for the minors will amount to Rs. 808 a year. That leaves a balance of Rs. 600 odd. The deed accordingly provides that Janardhan is to invest this Rs. 600 in certain ways for the benefit of the minors, and that provided he thus disburses these two main sums, viz., Rs. 808, for the various expenses and Rs. 600 for the investments making together about Rs. 1,409 he can take the whole income of the property, whether more or less, and be under no liability to account for it. That is, of course, during the minority of the minors. The deed says, "as only the income of lands and the interest due from others and rent from the date of the deed are included in this deed there is no need for keeping an account in respect of this, according to the conditions mentioned in the trust deed. Only you should keep an account in a proper manner, in respect of the principal amount if any (to) be received ... If any amount be expended for making special improvement for the cultivation of lands subsequently (in future) the amount should be taken from the amount belonging to the minors and an account should be kept in a proper manner." Subject to that and certain other provisions the deed ends: "As to all the particulars mentioned in the trust deed except only all the conditions mentioned in this deed, the same are kept alive and in this way the trust deed also is kept alive."

I think it quite clear that these two documents must be read together. In fact Janardhan had refused to act under the first document, and he is only acting under the first deed as modified by the second. Further, I think that the whole of the provisions must be taken together, and that it is not open to us to create a new bargain between the parties by eliminating all that is contained in the second deed about Janardhan taking the income for a fixed sum.

Now how are these very special provisions in the second deed to be justified? One must remember that this being joint property the father's interest ceased at the date of his death. What right then had he to tie down the future income of the property in this way and to say that the estate which he had no interest in after his death should only receive a particular fixed income although that income in fact might be very much larger? What right had he to appoint a manager, a so-called trustee, who was to be under no liability to account for the trust property but was to be at liberty to put it into his own pocket? What right had he to fix the maintenance of the widows at certain sums whether they liked it or whether they did not? What right had he to fix the maintenance of the minors at certain sums? What right had he to direct the investment of the balance of Rs. 600 in various ways which are certainly not trust investments, including deposit "in a society," and including, as I read the deed, a power for the sole manager Janardhan to keep the money on deposit with himself on payment of interest at $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.? And what security would there be that at the end, say of the thirteen years, Janardhan would be in a financial position to refund these various sums which would be due from him under this deed?

As my brother Crump has put it, we may test this matter in three or four different ways. Was it a power-of-attorney as Mukund calls it? That surely will not suffice. What right had Mukund to give any power-of-attorney existing after his death? Was it a trust deed, the alternative name given to the first deed? The answer to that is, what power had Mukund to create a trust after his own death, of property which after his own death did not belong to him? Then it is argued, treat it as an alienation; treat it as a transfer. But in the first place was there here really a transfer within the meaning of the Transfer of Property Act? Was there a conveyance to this defendant, Janardhan? Even supposing that in some ways it can be looked upon as an alienation, then what power had the father to enter into this very extraordinary alienation? You cannot call it a sale. You cannot call it a mortgage or a charge or a lease in the ordinary acceptation of those terms, more especially as it is muddled up with moveable properties including pots and pans. Can one say the relationship of landlord and tenant for instance was established here? And if one does regard it as an alienation, how can it be justified. By necessity? Necessity in the ordinary acceptation of the word, certainly there was none here. Granting the conditions which I have already stated, if protection of the minors' property was wanted, there are provisions under the Guardians and Wards Act for the appointment of guardians which should meet what was requisite. But there is no statutory power given to a Hindu father to tie up his property in this sort of way, for what he conceives to be the benefit of his children. And incidentally I may observe that if this deed was a valid deed, then it would seem to stand in the way of any appointment of a guardian under the Guardians and Wards Act. The deed is either a valid appointment of a guardian or it is not. If it is a valid appointment of a guardian, then I take it that under ss. 7 (3) and 39 Janardhan could only be removed on certain specified grounds, such as misconduct and so on.

We were referred to certain authorities. It was argued that a father's powers of alienation are not confined to cases of necessity, but may extend to cases of mere benefit. We are not called on in this case to review the well-established conditions laid down by the authorities as regards the powers of a Hindu father to alienate. We have the well-known case, Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Babooee Munraj Koonweree (1), which has often been dealt with and particularly in recent years in Palaniappa Chetty v. Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (2). The commentary in Mayne's Hindu Law, 9th Edition at page 476 is as follows:—

(1) 6 M. I. A. 393; 18 W. R. 81n; Sevestre 253n; 2 Suth. P. O. J. 29; 1 Sar. P. O. J. 552; 19 E. R. 147.

"Ever since this important judgment was pronounced, the terms 'necessity' and 'benefit to the estate' have been used side by side. It is obvious that anything which is a necessity to the estate must be of benefit to it. But the term 'benefit' would seem to import something positive done to enlarge or improve the estate, not a merely negative act such as the discharge of debts or the averting of disaster."

A reference is then made to the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Palaniappa Chetty v. Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (2) including a citation of the following passage (page 477):—

"No authority has been cited for giving any countenance to the notion that a she-bait is entitled to sell debutter lands solely for the purpose of so investing the price of it as to bring in an income larger than that derived from the probably safer and certainly more stable property, the debutter land itself."

In Vishnu Vishvanath Nimkar v. Ramchandra Sadashiv Nimkar (3) a decision of Sir Norman Macleod and Mr. Justice Crump, the above case of Palaniappa Chetty v. Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (2) was followed and applied. The head-note runs:—

"The manager of a joint Hindu family can justify the sale of joint family property only for necessity. He cannot justify it merely on the ground that the sale at the time appeared to be advantageous. Such a sale is not binding on the minor co-parceners."

The learned Pleader for the respondent No. 1, being pressed by these authorities, felt a difficulty in maintaining that a sale could be justified merely on the ground of some general benefit apart altogether from necessity. But he contended that this was not the case of a sale, that, but it was not the case of property passing for good out of the possession of the family; and that it was at the most something in the nature of a lease. In that respect another decision by the Board in Abhiram Goswami Mohant v. Shyama Charan Nandi (4) was referred to. There at page 1013* it is stated:—

"The second question is whether, this being so, the mohant had power to grant a mokurari pattah of the mouza. It is well-settled law that the power of the mohant to alienate debutter property is, like the power of the manager for an infant heir, limited to cases of unavoidable necessity: Prosanno Kumari Debya v. Golabchand Baboo (5)."

Then after referring to a particular case where the grant was upheld because the money was required for repairs for the temple their Lordships proceed (page 1013*):—

"But the general rule is that laid down in the case of Maharanees Shibessoree Debia v. Mothooranath Acharjo (6) that, apart from such necessity 'to create a new and fixed rent for all time, though adequate at the time, in lieu of giving the endowment the benefit of an augmentation of a variable rent from time to time, would be a breach of duty' in the mohant."

I appreciate that what is put there is for all time—something in the nature of a perpetual lease—whereas here it is a question of only some thirteen years. But, in my opinion, the respondents have failed to satisfy me that there is any such general power in a Hindu father as is contended for here, i.e., to alienate lands in any way he likes for anything that may be of general benefit to the family, whether or no there is any "necessity," so far as that expression has hitherto been interpreted.

Even if it comes to the question of benefit, I am not satisfied on the facts of the present case that the respondents have discharged the onus which undoubtedly lies upon them in this respect. Treating it as an alienation Janardhan was taking the family property for a particular fixed sum over a term of years. Prima facie it would lie on him to justify that alienation. But when we turn to the evidence I find it most difficult, speaking for myself, to get any clear idea as to whether the fixed sum arranged by Mukund was really a fair sum to fix. Janardhan himself says he knew nothing whatever about the rents of the property prior to the date of the lease. He did not enquire, he only asked whether the rent fixed was a fair one, and being informed that it was, he signed the deed. He does not even tell us of whom he enquired or who told him it was fair.

It is argued that presumably the father in the interests of his own children would be sure to fix a fair rent, and that we must, therefore, presume that the rents were fair. But I am not prepared to go to that length. It might amount to this, that every time a father sells or leases, it must be assumed prima facie that the transaction was a fair one from a pecuniary point of view. In other words the onus in that case will be shifted from the person on whom, in my opinion, it properly falls, viz., the alienee. It must also be noticed here that there are passages in Janardhan's own evidence which seem to point to the fact that he was getting the property at a reduced rent. I may also notice this, that apart from this question of a fixed sum, he was in addition to be paid a remuneration of Rs. 180 per annum. This was the remuneration he got under the earlier deed. He was still to retain it under the second deed although he was presumably getting some benefit by paying a fixed sum for the income of the lands.

It would not be right of me to dispose of this case without referring to the second point of law and to the cases decided upon it, viz., whether in general a Hindu father has power to appoint a testamentary guardian of property by Will. In that respect, no doubt, there is a conflict of authority. And I can quite appreciate that the learned trial Judge felt himself embarrassed by this. I can also understand his view that in these circumstances he thought it his duty to follow the latest decision in this Court in preference to an earlier decision of this Court the other way and in preference to a Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court. The earlier decision in this Court, Harilal Bapuji v. Bai Mani (7), was a decision of Mr. Justice Russell and Mr. Justice Aston. There the father made a Will appointing his son as heir to the whole property which was ancestral. He also appointed trustees to administer the property till his son should attain twenty-one with power to the trustees to take possession. He also gave the trustees power to sell any part of the property and to purchase new property. It was held that the appointment of a trustee was void since at the moment of the testator's death the whole of the property became the property of the son. Further, that no trust was created by the Will because the property in question was not one transferable to the beneficiary.

In Mahableshwar Krishnappa v. Ram Chandra Mangesh (8), which was a decision of Sir Basil Scott and Mr. Justice Beaman, the manager of a joint Hindu family executed a mukhtiar providing for the management of the family estate including settlement of money-debts and pecuniary claims both during his lifetime and after his death. The mukhtiar was empowered to manage the estate as he thought fit. The Court there held that the power to manage implied the power to sell, that it was binding on the minors and that the sale could not be treated as a nullity inasmuch as a dying adult Hindu might appoint a manager and trustee without interfering with the succession to the property. The judgment of the Bench was largely put upon this that it was a matter of great practical convenience that a Hindu father should have such a power. It is said (page 103*):—

"In a family consisting in other respects of minors and women it is a matter of practical convenience that the dying adult male should be able to make arrangements for guardianship and management, otherwise a dead-lock and loss would be arrived at through various widows quarrelling among themselves."

In Chidambara Pillai v. Rangasami Naicker (9) a Full Bench of that High Court considered the matter, and the finding was that the only adult co-parcener of a Mitakshara family consisting of himself and his minor co-parceners is not competent to appoint a testamentary guardian to the co-parcenary properties of the minor co-parceners. Mr. Justice Ayling, in delivering the first judgment, agrees with the observations of Mr. Justice Sadasiva Ayyar in an earlier case in which that learned Judge said (page 570*):—

"On principle I find it difficult to hold that a man who cannot deal with a particular species of property by Will can make arrangements for the management of that property by Will after his death or can appoint guardians to manage that property for minor owners who obtain it by survivorship after his death."

There Mr. Justice Coutts Trotter, as he then was, says (page 572*):—

"His argument seemed to me to come merely to this: The thing is convenient, it is consonant with all right notions of what a father ought to be able to do for his children; it is nowhere expressly prohibited; therefore it can be done. To me on the contrary it seems that to put a person in a definite legal relation to property of which he is not the owner is a step which cannot be taken unless there is legal authority for taking it. Its convenience and justice may be admirable reasons for the Legislature to take action. They cannot, in my opinion, suffice to set in motion a Court of Law."

The remaining Judge, Mr. Justice Seshagiri Ayyar, deals in some detail with the previous authorities on the point, and in the result arrives at the same conclusion.

There is one other case in Deba Nand v. Anandmani (10), which is a decision of Sir Grimwood Mears and Mr. Justice Sulaiman. The head-note runs:

"A Hindu father can by word or writing nominate a guardian for his children, the nomination taking effect after his death. He is unrestricted in the choice of a guardian, and may exclude even the mother from the guardianship."

But although this case was argued in August, 1920, whereas the Madras Full Bench decision had been argued in 1917 and in 1918 it does not appear that the latter was brought to the attention of their Lordships. Nor is there any reference in the judgment to the two Bombay cases which I have referred to.

Reliance was also placed on the Calcutta case, Soobah Prithee Lal Jha v. Soobah Door-gah Lal Jha (11), but speaking for myself, I hardly view it as a cogent authority in favour of the respondents, for at the most it amounts to this that it is not shown that the appointment of a guardian is prohibited by Hindu Law. I would rather say that if this important power is to exist in a Mitakshara family, then one would want positive evidence of the existence of the power rather than some negative statement that it is not prohibited.

If this had been a simple case of appointing a testamentary guardian of property, then it may well be that having regard to the conflict of authority both in our own Court and between other High Courts, it would be proper to send the case to a Full Bench. But in the view I take there is a very marked difference in this case from any other which has been cited to us. I refer to the provision in the second deed that the alleged guardian is not to be liable to account, and that he is to take the produce of the property for his own benefit paying yearly a fixed sum for it. That to my mind goes far beyond anything that was held justified in Mahableshwar Krishnappa v. Ramchandra Mangesh (8) or for the matter of that, in any of the other cases that have been cited to us. Accordingly I think we can dispose of this case on its own facts by saying that in any event the deeds here, when considered together, went far beyond the powers of a Hindu father in a Mitakshara family. Whether in any event a father could appoint a testamentary guardian of property at all, must, as I have already indicated, be regarded as open to grave doubt having regard to the authorities which I have cited.

I will only add a reference to the argument that the documents here were deeds inter vivos and not a Will. To my mind that makes little or no difference. If a man purports to dispose of property after his death, in substance it is a Will, whether you call it a deed or whether you call it a Will. If you treat it as a conveyance or alienation inter vivos, then he is still purporting to deal with an interest in the property after his death. One has then to see whether he has any power to make a settlement inter vivos of that nature. I take it then that practically the same principles would apply, bearing in mind that he is purporting to operate on property—at any rate in part—as from the date of his own death, when ex hypothesi he no longer has any interest left in that property. In the present case, therefore, Mukund had no interest in the property after his death which he could vest in the trustees of any settlement, whether that settlement was made by deed or by Will.

There were other allegations in the case, allegations which ought not to have been made, charging Janardhan with fraud and undue influence. Those allegations were held by the trial Judge to be quite unfounded, and I respectfully agree with what the trial Judge said in that respect. But on the main part of the case as to whether these deeds can be upheld, in my judgment they cannot. They are accordingly voidable at the suit of the minors, and, therefore, in my judgment they must be cancelled and set aside as from the death of Mukund. It follows that Janardhan will have to account as from the death of Mukund. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

As regards the costs, I would say this. It was put to us that Janardhan had no personal interest in this matter, but was merely contesting this litigation because of his uncle's wishes. But that argument overlooks the fact that Janardhan took a personal pecuniary interest under this document, because he was getting the income at a fixed sum. Further he has chosen to stand by that document and to put in a defence raising every possible objection. Having eventually failed, I think he must be treated as any ordinary litigant who puts forward a document under which he claims a personal interest. It is not, therefore, a case where an absolute owner of property has caused confusion by making an ambiguous Will, under which circumstances it may be only right that as he caused the trouble, therefore, the costs should come out of his estate. On the other hand I recognize that there are these charges of fraud and undue influence on which Janardhan has succeeded. On the whole, therefore, I would hold that the fair order is that he do bear his own costs in both Courts and that the costs of the minors come out of the estate.

I will conclude with saying this. We quite appreciate the warning that the learned trial Judge who has had the advantage of seeing the witnesses, has given us. He has intimated in clear terms that an undesirable person is at the bottom of this litigation, and that consequently if the deeds are set aside the result may be that the property of the minors will suffer. We think, therefore, this is a case where the question of the appointment of a guardian under the Guardians and Wards Act should be carefully considered by the Court; and further that the case is one where we may suggest for the consideration of the Collector whether he should not apply under the Guardians and Wards Act for a guardian to be appointed. So long as Janardhan has to account in this suit for the property and income he has received, I see difficulties in appointing him guardian of the property of the minors. But apart from that point, speaking for myself, I see nothing in this case which would in any way prevent him from being appointed by the Court to be guardian of the property of the minors, if the Court after considering all the facts came to the conclusion that that was in the interest of the minor. But while he has to account in this suit, as I have already said, there is a technical and practical difficulty in appointing him guardian.

I would accordingly direct that the appeal be allowed and that consequential relief be granted in the manner I have indicated.

Crump, J.—I entirely agree with the judgment pronounced by the learned Chief Justice, and in view of the fact that every point in the case has been fully covered, I do not desire to pronounce a separate judgment beyond expressing my concurrence.

Per Curiam.—Appeal allowed. Deeds to be cancelled and set aside as from the death of Mukund. Account to be taken of all property and the income thereof as from the date of death of Mukund. As regards possession Mr. Nilkant says that his client, respondent No. 1, is willing to give up possession at once, but the question arises as to whom the possession should be given pending any application for the appointment of a guardian of the property under the Guardians and Wards Act. On the whole we think that the best solution is to appoint the Nazir of the First Class Subordinate Judge's Court (at Karwar) to be the Receiver of the property until the termination of the suit or until further order with liberty to apply. The order will provide for possession being eventually given to the guardian appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act.

We hope that matters will so arrange themselves that a proper guardian will be appointed, and accordingly any difficulty will be got over. If any difficulty remains, the parties will apply to the trial Court.

The respondent No. 1 is to bear his own costs in both Courts and the costs of the minors are to come out of the estate.

Copy of our decree will be sent to the Collector under O. XXXIII, r. 14, in relation to pauper suits, and also with reference to our recommendations in regard to an appointment under the Guardians and Wards Act.

Maharaja of Dumraon v. Secretary of State for India (1), distinguished.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Sultanpur, dated the 3rd February, 1927, reversing that of the Munsif, Sultanpur, dated the 25th August, 1926.

Mr. H. Husain, for the Appellants.

Messrs. B. N. Srivastava and Bishambharnath, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is the plaintiffs' appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Sultanpur, dated the 3rd February, 1927, reversing the decree of the Munsif of the same place, dated the 25th of August, 1926.

The matter in controversy is the title to a plot of land No. 207 measuring 3 bighas 8 biswas now held in possession by the defendants who are the owners of village Maing in the District of Sultanpur. The plaintiffs claim title to this land on two alternative grounds. The first is that the land has by gradual change in the course of the river Gomti become an accession to their village Soti and this state of fact creates title in them both according to law and the custom of the village. The second ground of claim is that at the First Regular Settlement of the village Soti the land in suit formed part of village Soti and that on its re-emergence now after it had been under water for long it has retained its identity as land appertaining to the village Soti.

As to the first ground of claim, the trial Court held that having regard to the geographical situation of the land in suit it is an accession exclusively neither to the one village nor to the other but to both. On the second ground of claim the same Court held that it was well founded and decreed the suit.

On appeal by the defendants the learned Subordinate Judge of Sultanpur formed the opinion that the land in suit must be held to have accreted to the defendants' village Maing by gradual change in the course of the river. With this finding I concur. As to the second ground on which the plaintiffs claim title to the land in question the learned Subordinate Judge does not appear to have fully appreciated the bearing of the fact that the land in suit is identifiable with the land of the village Soti belonging to the plaintiffs as it lay with regard to its geographical situation in relation to the river at the time of the First Regular Settlement. He, however, accepts the finding of the Court of first instance as to the identity of the land in suit with the land which appertained to the plaintiffs' village at the First Regular Settlement.

If the facts had stood there, there is no doubt the plaintiffs would be entitled to a decree in spite of the finding against them on the first ground of their claim. This will be so by the rule of law as recently explained by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Maharaja of Dumraon v. Secretary of State for India (1) followed by a Bench of this Court in the case of Sher Bahadur Singh v. Tafazul Husain (2).

Now the intervening facts, which to my mind have the effect of fully supporting the decree under appeal, are that after the land in suit had remained submerged it re-appeared in the year 1892 if not earlier as an accretion to the lands of a village called Madhopur on the opposite side of the river and since its re-appearance it has been measured as a part of the village of Madhopur during the last Settlement and possessed by the owners of that village. This exercise of proprietary title by the zemindars of the village of Madhopur over the land in suit was continued for at least a period of 30 years before the river again began to change its course and threw out the land in suit on the side of the defendants' village. The learned Subordinate Judge has fully considered the effect of these facts and is of opinion that "Soti people had thus lost every semblance of title to it so long ago as the date of the last Settlement." I am unable to interfere with this finding of the learned Subordinate Judge. This being so, the fact that the land in suit belonged 30 years ago to the proprietors of the village Soti is of no consequence on the question of subsisting title of the plaintiffs.

I accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge at Ratnagiri, in Appeal No. 282 of 1923, confirming the decree of the Subordinate Judge at Deogad, in Civil Suit No. 281 of 1922.

Mr. P. W. Kane, for Mr. P. B. Shingne, for the Appellant.

Messrs. A. G. Desai and S. R. Parulekar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In this case one Baya Bhavin executed a mortgage dated April 15, 1916, of the property in suit in favour of the defendant Narayan and his deceased brother Lakshman for Rs. 900. On Baya's death in 1921 the plaintiff purchased the equity of redemption from her sister Saguna on May 18, 1922, and brought the present suit for redemption. One of the defences set up by the mortgagee was that as Baya Bhavin acquired the property by prostitution, her sister Saguna was not the heir, and the property must escheat to the Crown, and that the plaintiff as purchaser from Saguna was not entitled to redeem. Both the lower Courts held that Saguna was the heir of Baya and allowed the plaintiff to redeem.

It is argued by the learned Pleader on behalf of the appellant-mortgagee that Saguna is not the heir of Baya, who was a prostitute, on the ground that the sister according to the Vyavahara Mayukha could only inherit as a gotraja sapinda, and that Saguna was neither a gotraja nor a sapinda, that sapinda relationship depended on marriage and uterine sister was unknown as an heir in Hindu Law. Baya belonged to the community of Bhavins who, according to Ratnagiri Gazetteer, page 126, practised prostitution and were dedicated to the temples like Murlis in the Deccan. The rights of daughters taking before sons in the case of inheritance to a dancing girl attached to Pagodas were upheld in Madras. See Tara Munnee Dassea v. Motee Buneanee (1), Kamakshi v. Nagarathnam (2), Narasanna v. Gangu (3) and Arunagiri Mudali v. Ranganayaki Ammal (4). In the present case Baya belonged to a prostitute class and the question whether prostitution entailed degradation from caste and severed the tie which connected her to her kindred by blood does not arise. In this connection reference may be made to recent cases of Meenakshi v. Muniandi Panikkan (5), Hari Lal Singh v. Tripura Charan Roy (6) and Narain Das v. Tirlok Tiwari (7).

In the case of Myna Boyee v. Ootaram (8) where an Englishman, Mr. Hughes, had two illegitimate children by a Brahmin woman who had deserted her husband, the Privy Council held that the illegitimate children were to be considered as Hindus and their rights were governed by Hindu Law. At page 424* their Lordships observed: "To assume without evidence, on assertion simply, a capacity in the appellant and his uterine brother to inherit to their mother, and assuming that capacity of lineal inheritance to their mother, thence to derive collateral heirship, inter se, to property which never was their mother's, would be at variance with legal principles," and feeling difficulty in dealing with the case remitted the question to India for further investigation and consideration. On remand the Madras High Court in Mayna Bai v. Uttaram (9) held that the children were to be regarded as Sudras or a class still lower and that in the absence of preferable heirs, they inherited the property of their mother and of one another. At page 203† the learned Judges observed:—

"Our reasoning, therefore, is that there is no authority against the existence of heritable blood between the woman and her illegitimate offspring. Taukuram and his brother are decided to be Hindus. They are the Hindu sons of a woman, who was either a woman of a class lower than the fourth of Manu's classes, and in this case the sons are cognate to her and to one another, as the children of a class not twice-born out of wedlock, and entitled to inherit to their mother, and only not capable of inheriting to their father because he is not a Hindu at all. If not so, she is a mere prostitute, and of the cognation between her and her offspring there exists no doubt whatever."

In Sivasangu v. Minal (10) it was held that the sister succeeded to the estate of married Maraver woman who deserted her husband and lived in adultery. This decision is directly against the contention of the appellant. In Subramania Iyer v. Rathnavelu Chetty (11) Kumaraswami Sastriyar, J., held that the whole law of succession to dancing girls and prostitutes in cases not expressly provided for by rules relating to stridhan has been built up by Courts on analogies furnished by other parts of the Hindu Law, and at page 73* referred to the decision in Subbaratna Mudali v. Balakrishnaswami Naidu (12) where the learned Judges observed (page 209*):—

"The rules as to stridhan obviously do not apply to such property and there is no other rule of succession laid down in the Smrithis or by the commentators prescribing the devolution of the property of women of this caste, except it be the general rule 'that to the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs.'"

The question as to whether the Vaishya, i. e., prostitute class, forms a fifth division of Hindus like the four divisions of Brahmins, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Sudras, or whether they are included in the Sudra division has been discussed in Ram Pargash Singh v. Dhan Bibi (13) where it was held that the Vaishyas, i. e., prostitute class, are governed in matters of succession by the Mitakshara, and, following the case of Advaya v. Rudrava (14), it was held that the Mitakshara did not bar the succession of an unchaste or immoral daughter. In Viswanatha Mudaly v. Doraiswami Mudaly (15) it was held that there was heritable blood between the sons of a dancing girl or a prostitute and that the legitimate descendants of two sons of a Hindu dancing woman are under the Hindu Law entitled to succeed to each other. The authorities referred to above would support the claim of plaintiff in this case that there is heritable blood between Saguna and Baya and that Saguna as sister is the heir of Baya.

Apart from the reported decisions there are no express texts relating to succession of a prostitute. The only reference to Vaishya or prostitute class in the Mitakshara appears in the commentary on Yajñavalkya's verse 290, Vyavahara Adhyaya, in the Chapter of स्त्रीसम्बन्ध. There, a reference is made to the Skandapurana, and it is stated: "There are certain Apsarasas called Panchachuda; their progeny is known as the Vaishya, and is regarded as a fifth caste." The prostitute class may, therefore, be considered as a lower class than the Sudras. See Mitakshara, Gharpure's translation, pages 409 and 410. The portion of the Skandapurana is translated at page 409 in a foot-note.

The order of succession to the estate of a deceased prostitute is not laid down in the texts. The sister is not expressly mentioned in the compact series of heirs in Sapratibandha Daya, i. e., obstructed heritage of a male, but her place in the order of succession is placed by Nilakantha in the Vyavahara Mayukha between the paternal grandmother and the paternal grandfather. See Vyavahara Mayukha, Ch. IV, s. VIII, pl. 19; Stokes, p. 89; Gharpure's translation, p. 114: "In default of her (i. e., paternal grandmother) comes the sister, for, says Manu 'To her who is the nearest sapinda the inheritance shall belong.' Brihaspati says 'Where there are many (claimants), viz., the Jnatis, the Sakulyas and also the Bandhavas, he who is the nearest among these, shall take the wealth of the childless.' Being born in the brother's gotra she also is in no respect other than a gotraja. Indeed she has no Sagotrata but that has not been mentioned here as an operating cause for the right of inheritance." It is argued on behalf of the appellant that a sister of a prostitute cannot be gotraja sapinda as there can be no gotra in the prostitute class. But there can be gotra only in the three Varnas असनानासि गोत्रजास्त्रियेतत्रैव वारिक्म्. See Mitakshara, Achara Adhyaya, Yajñavalkya, verse 53. The Brahmins have gotra; but in the case of Kshatriyas and Vaishyas they have not their own gotra, the gotra of their preceptor is to be considered their gotra. Therefore, it follows that in the case of Sudras there is no gotra. But a sister would be the heir of a male Sudra and succeed as gotraja sapinda. In the case of Sudras the gotra may be considered as synonymous with kul, i. e., family. In any view of the case the sister is an heir of the Sapratibandha Daya of a male and would not come in, under the above text of the Vyavahara Mayukha, as heir of a female prostitute. There is also considerable force in the contention that the sister of a prostitute cannot come in as heir under the texts relating to heirs to the stridhan of a woman because in determining the succession of kinsmen in the absence of issue, regard is had to the form of marriage, and in the case of four forms of marriage as the Brahma and others, the succession goes to her husband and in his absence to one nearest to him in his family, and in the other forms of marriage to her father or in his absence to one nearest to her in his family. In the case of a female belonging to a prostitute class there is neither a husband nor a father. Similarly, it is difficult to apply the order of succession relating to the Sulka of a damsel (kanya) to the inheritance of a deceased Vaishya or prostitute. In Tara v. Krishna (16) Sir Narayan Chandavarkar held that a Murli who lived by prostitution was entitled to her father's property only in default of either married or unmarried daughters on the ground that a woman, who in her maiden condition becomes a prostitute, Sadharana Stri, is neither a kanya (unmarried) nor Kulastri nor Bharya (married woman). The succession, therefore, to the estate of a prostitute would be governed by analogies derived from Hindu Law. The rule of Atidasha whereby principles laid down with reference to one case are applied to analogous cases was recognised, by Jaimini in his Mimansa (Bks VII and VIII of Jaimini's Mimansa) See Subramania Iyer v. Rathnavelu Chetty (11). In considering, therefore, the right of a sister to succeed to a female prostitute, the texts relating to her right to succeed to the Sapratibandha Daya of a male may be considered as applicable by analogy, viz., the text of Manu, Ch. IX, verse 187: "To the nearest sapinda the inheritance shall belong," and also the text of Brihaspati that "the nearest Sakulya shall take the wealth of a childless person." The question, therefore, is whether the sister of a female prostitute is her nearest sapinda. Sapinda relationship is defined in the Mitakshara on verse 52 of Achara Adhyaya of Yajnavalkya Smriti. Mitakshara says that sapinda relationship lies in the connection through the particles of the same body सपिण्डता च एकाशरीरावयवान्वयेन भवति. After describing sapinda relationship with the father and the paternal grandfather, the Mitakshara deals similarly with the sapinda relationship with the mother because of the connection with the particles of the mother's body, and lays down that wherever the term sapinda is found, connection with the particles of the same body directly or indirectly should be understood. See translation—Appendix A of Setlur's Collection of Hindu Law Books of Inheritance. While commenting on Yajnavalkya's verse 117 (3rd quarter) Vyavahara Adhyaya, and dealing with the right of a daughter to succeed to her mother the Mitakshara says that it is proper that the stridhan property goes to the daughter because the portions of the body of the female parent abound in the female children, and the father's estate goes to the sons as portions of the body of the father abound in the male children (Mitakshara, Ch. I, s. 3, pl. 9 and 10; Gharpure's translation, page 189; Stokes' Hindu Law, page 383). Again while discussing the right of priority of the mother over the father in the compact series the Mitakshara in commenting on Yajnavalkya's verse 136 gives first the grammatical reason that the word Mata comes first in the compound मातापितरौ (mother and father) and proceeds to lay down that the father is the common parent to the other sons also, but the mother is not so, and since her propinquity, i.e., प्रत्यासत्ति, is consequently greatest, it is just that she should take the estate in the first instance according to the text "to him who is the nearest among the sapindas the inheritance shall belong." (Mitakshara, Ch. II, s. 3, pl. 2 to 5; Gharpure's translation, pages 249 and 250 and Stokes, pages 441 to 443). If the analogies of Hindu Law are applied to a prostitute mother, the daughters are the sapindas of the mother as the particles of the mother's body abound in them, and they are sapindas of each other because they are connected with each other through one body of the mother. Saguna would, therefore, be the sapinda heir of Baya on the analogy of Hindu Law.

In this connection reference may also be made to verse 191 of Manu, Ch. IX: "Of two sons begotten of the same woman by two different men contending for the paternal estate let either of them take the property by his own (natural) father and no other." It is contended that this text refers to one legitimate son and the other son born of re-marriage. But in the commentary of Sarvadna-Narayan the other son is described as Golaka or Pūnarbhava and Golaka is not the son born of lawful wedlock. This text is discussed in Arunagiri Mudali v. Ranganayaki Ammal (4). Reference may also be made to Nanda Pandita's Vaijayanti, commentary on Vishnu Smriti, where the order of precedence among brothers and sisters of the whole blood and of half blood is given as follows: (1) brothers of the whole blood, (2) sisters of the whole blood, (3) sons of the same father, (4) sons of the same mother. The son of the same mother and a different father is considered as an heir. See translation of the passage at foot-note on page 208 of Hindu Law of Partition, Tagore Law Lectures by Jolly, 1855 Edition. The original text is printed in appendix at page 287 of Jolly's Tagore Law Lectures. It is contended by Mr. Kane that the words अन्यपतिमाश्रित्य in the text show that the second son is one born in lawful wedlock, but the text affords some basis for the contention that there is heritable blood between sons of the same mother by different fathers. Reference may be made in this connection to the case of Ekoba Parashram v. Kashiram Totaram (17). Relying on the above two texts Devadoss, J., in Viswanatha Mudaly v. Doraiswami Mudaly (15), remarks (page 954*):—

"The existence of heritable blood between sons of the same mother by different fathers cannot, therefore, be through the father and is attributable only to their being sons of the same mother. It is not, therefore, necessary that in order to have heritable blood, inheritance should be traced through the father. It logically follows that the sons of a dancing woman or a prostitute have heritable blood between them."

Wallace, J., at page 960*, after referring to the theory of sapinda relationship as propounded by the Mitakshara, held that there was no authority for the proposition that sapinda relationship cannot exist without a father. In Dundappa Basappa v. Bhimawa Baswantiappa (18), it was held by Macleod, C. J., relying on Ghosh's Hindu Law, page 763, that under the Hindu Law the illegitimate daughter of a Sudra succeeds to her mother in absence of any nearer heir.

Lastly, before the Crown gets the property by escheat it must be shown that Baya died without any relations or any heirs-at-law: see Gridhari Lal Roy v. Bengal Government (19). See Vyavahara Mayukha, Ch. IV, s. 8, pl. 5 and 27; Mitakshara, Ch. II, s. 7, pl. 6; Stokes' Hindu Law, pages 85, 450. In Ganpat Rama Joshi v. Secretary of State for India (20) it was held, following Kanakammal v. Ananthamathi Ammal (21) that blood relations would at any rate succeed to the exclusion of the Crown. The Madras ruling is based on the opinion of Dr. Banerjee and West and Buhler, page 544. Saguna would be at least a blood relation of Baya and is entitled to succeed before the property goes to the Crown by escheat.

We think, therefore, that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL JURISDICTION
No. 43 OF 1927.

July 14, 1927.

Present:—Sir George Claus Rankin, Kt.,
Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Mitter.

S. N. BANERJEE—DEFENDANT—

versus

HUSEYN SHAHIED SUHRAWARDY

—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. IX, r. 13—
Ex parte decree on Original Side of High Court—R. 13, whether applicable—Power of High Court to restore on terms where there is no 'sufficient cause'—Ex parte decree against two defendants—One defendant not properly served—Restoration against all defendants, when proper.

Although it has been the practice on the Original Side of the Calcutta High Court to follow the analogy of O. IX, r. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure on general principles of justice, and, as a rule, a case decided ex parte will not be restored unless there be sufficient cause for the party not being ready to go on with the case when the case came before the Court, yet the exact words of O. IX, r. 13 are not to be applied on the footing that they are directly applicable and are exhaustive, and it is open to the High Court in its discretion to restore a suit upon proper terms even though there is an element of negligence on the party applying for restoration. [p. 93, col. 1.]

In a suit for damages for defamation on the Original Side of the High Court against the Printer and the Editor of a newspaper the summons was served on the Printer but not on the Editor. The Printer requested the Manager to undertake the defence and the latter agreed to do so. On the day of hearing neither of the defendants appeared and an ex parte decree was passed. The Editor applied for restoration of the suit and the Printer prayed that the decree may be set aside as against him also. The application of the Printer was dismissed on the ground that there was no 'sufficient cause' for his non-appearance and that the case did not fall within the proviso to O. IX, r. 13, Civil Procedure Code. On appeal:

Held, that the decree must be set aside as a whole even as against the Printer and that the High Court had power to do so. [p. 93, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Buckland, dated the 25th February, 1927, passed in the exercise of Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction.

Messrs. S. N. Banerjee (Sr.), B. C. Ghose, and D. N. Sen, for the Appellant.

Mr. J. N. Mazumdar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Buckland whereby he refused to restore a suit which was decreed ex parte. It appears that a newspaper of which the first defendant was the Editor and the present appellant—the second defendant—was the Printer published an article on the 27th July, 1926, referring to the plaintiff. The plaintiff says that the article is defamatory and, on the 8th November, 1926, he brought a suit for damages against the Editor and the Printer. On the 6th December summons was served upon the Printer. It appears to have been established that the summons was not served upon the Editor. The Printer says that he handed over the summons to be attended to by the Manager of the newspaper but that, owing to the fact that the summons was not served on the Editor or owing to some independent negligence, the Manager took no steps, though he had promised to do so, to have the suit defended on the part of the Printer. It is necessary that it should be understood what happened upon this default. Under the rules of the Original Side, a person served with a summons is required to enter an appearance in the office of the Court. That is an act which does not require his personal attendance and it does not involve his appearing before the Court himself with or without his witnesses. If he does not enter appearance within the time limited, the case will go into what is called the undefended list; and, when the case is on the undefended list, it is not possible for the defendant, without obtaining leave, to enter appearance. He has a limited right to cross-examine witnesses adduced on behalf of the plaintiff if he appears at the time when the undefended case is down for hearing: but his position is that of a man who for not entering appearance in time is precluded from defending the suit, whether he appears at the hearing or does not appear at the hearing. A similar form of procedure is applicable to a case where a person has entered appearance but has made default in the filing of his written statement and again in the case of a person who has failed to obtain leave to defend in a suit on a negotiable instrument under O. XXXVII, Civil Procedure Code. In the present case, no appearance was entered. The suit came on the undefended list on the 3rd January, 1927, and the minute shows what took place before the Court on that occasion. Learned Counsel Mr. I. B. Sen when the plaintiff had given his evidence in part appeared and represented to the Court that the writ had not been served on the first defendant—the Editor; and he asked that the case might stand over to enable the first defendant to enter appearance. I should have explained that this case came on the undefended list on the footing that both these defendants had been served and both had made default in entering appearance. It was being heard, therefore, against both as an undefended suit. Mr. Sen stated in reply to the Court that he had not yet been instructed on behalf of the first defendant. Whether this means that Mr. Sen by that time was instructed on behalf of the present appellant is not quite clear. The Court refused Mr. Sen's application for time holding that he had no locus standi. That, of course, was quite correct.

A person who is not allowed to enter appearance cannot employ an Attorney or Counsel to appear on his behalf except possibly for a limited purpose specially provided for. Under these circumstances, a decree for Rs. 7,500 for damages was passed against both the defendants. Then the Editor applied to have the decree set aside as against him and he succeeded in his application ostensibly on the ground that the writ of summons was not served on him. The Printer applied on the 18th of January, 1927, to have the decree set aside so far as he was concerned and the learned Judge has refused that application holding that, as he was served on the 6th of December, the negligence of the Manager—his failure to provide for the defence of the suit—was not a "sufficient cause" within the meaning of O. IX, r. 13, Civil Procedure Code. He has held further that this case is not one within the concluding proviso to that rule. On that, the Printer brings this appeal. It would appear from the judgment of Mr. Justice Buckland that the plaintiff said that he did not oppose the application of the Editor to have the suit restored as against him because he wanted him to have an opportunity of putting in a plea of justification. The position, therefore, is that the plaintiff, according to him, is anxious to fight out this question with the Editor but desires that the judgment against the Printer should stand in any event. I have some difficulty in seeing that this course is either reasonable or heroic and, in my opinion, it is necessary for us to consider whether this Court is bound either to affirm that there is "sufficient cause" within the meaning of O. IX, r. 13, Civil Procedure Code; or to refuse to set aside the decree.

In my judgment, O. IX, r. 13, Civil Procedure Code, is directed in terms to a different practice from that which obtains on the Original Side of the High Court and was followed in this case. It refers to the case which is the usual case in a mofussil Court where a summons has gone to a defendant informing him that on a given date the case will come on before the Court for hearing or for settlement of issues. The ordinary practice under O. V and the forms in the Schedule to the Code sufficiently elucidate that. In the mofussil, therefore, the question arises in the form whether or not the defendant was prevented by "sufficient cause" from appearing when the suit was called on for hearing. In the High Court, the question is whether or not the defendant has entered an appearance in the office. If he has not entered an appearance within a certain time, then his right to enter appearance comes to an end upon the suit being sent to the undefended list in the absence of leave from a Judge. It does seem to me that there are many cases in the High Court where the mere fact that the plaintiff himself or the defendant himself was unable personally to attend on the day of the hearing would be no excuse at all because there are many cases in which the party is not a necessary witness and in which he was really intending to present his case by the assistance of Attorney and Counsel. I am unable to hold that the exact words of r. 13 of O. IX are to be applied on the footing that they are directly applicable under the rules of the Original Side and that they are exhaustive. It has been the general practice on the Original Side to follow the analogy of r. 13 of O. IX on general principles of justice. As a rule, the case will not be restored unless there be sufficient cause for the party not being ready to go on with the case when the case came before the Court. But on the Original Side, at all events, the terms of r. 13 do not prevent the Court where there is an element of negligence from restoring the suit upon proper terms. My own view is that the main purpose of r. 13 of O. IX is to give a right to a party who could show sufficient cause to get a restoration on certain terms independently having to make a plea to the mercy of the Court. The words are "the Court shall make an order setting aside the decree as against him upon such terms as to costs, payment into Court or otherwise as it thinks fit;" I am not prepared to hold that the Court is deprived by this rule of its discretion in a case like the present. If the matter is a question of discretion to be exercised on terms, I have a clear opinion that this would be a proper case in which to set aside the decree as against the Printer. It is quite clear that there is an absurdity if this judgment should go against the Printer and the Editor should be held not liable in respect of the same publication. Moreover, in the case of the Printer of a newspaper, it does not seem to be unreasonable that, in a question of this kind, he should go to the Manager and request the Manager to undertake the whole of the defence. It is true that when he does so, he is in some sense responsible as having entrusted the Manager on his behalf to look after the case. But it may be a great hardship to a Printer in a case of this kind who honestly relies upon the Manager doing his duty as, indeed, he has promised to do, to find a judgment of Rs. 7,000 against him on the ground that this does not amount to "sufficient cause" and that the Court is powerless to rescind the decree. Nothing that I have said is to be regarded in any way as pronouncing an opinion to the effect that in cases coming from the mofussil—from Courts to which r. 13 of O. IX, Civil Procedure Code, in its terms applies—the 13th rule is not to be regarded as exhaustive. Nor do I propose to define "sufficient cause." These questions may be left open for the purposes of the present case. Nor am I saying that what the learned Judge has said about s. 151, Civil Procedure Code, is not well-founded. It may be that, as a rule, s. 151 is wrongly invoked in cases which are covered by special legislation. I confine myself to the application of the principle of this rule to the very different practice that prevails on the Original Side of this High Court. I am not satisfied that the traditional view that the Court has a discretion independently of O. IX, r. 13 is wrong, and, in my judgment, this is a case in which the appeal should be allowed. At the same time the reason of default is a reason which must be attributed to the appellant and, in my judgment, he ought to pay the costs both before Mr. Justice Buckland and before this Court.

Mitter, J.—I agree.

CIVIL RULE No. 695 OF 1927.

August 15, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Cuming and Mr. Justice Roy.

ASIM KRISHNA DEB—DEFENDANT No. 1
—PETITIONER

versus

SAILESH CHANDRA GHOSH

AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115-g

Valid partial award—Refusal of Court to pass decree—Revision—Interference—Jurisdiction, meaning of—Revision of interlocutory order.

Certain arbitrators who were authorised to make separate awards from time to time in a partition suit, refused to act after making an award as to some of the matters in dispute and the Court refused to pass a decree on the basis of the award on the ground that the award was partial. One of the parties applied to the High Court for revision of this order:

Held, per Cuming, J. (Roy, J., dissenting).—That the High Court had no jurisdiction to interfere under s. 115, Civil Procedure Code, inasmuch as the lower Court had not in any way refused to exercise its jurisdiction or acted illegally or with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction, even though it might have committed an error of law or fact; and that the High Court should not interfere in any case as the order was only an interlocutory one. [p. 95, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Roy, J.—Inasmuch as there had been an effective award, the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to deal with the properties concerned, and the case was a fit one for interference in revision. [p. 96, col. 2.]

A High Court has power to interfere in revision with interlocutory orders where great hardship may otherwise result to the parties. [ibid.]

Rule against an order of the Sub-Judge, Third Court, 24-Parganas (Alipur), dated the 25th March, 1927.

Mr. Bankim Chandra Mukherjee, Dr. Bijan Kumar Mukherjee, Mr. N. N. Bhose, Babus Manindra Kumar Bose and Jatindra N. Guha, for the Opposite-Party.

JUDGMENT.

Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this Rule has arisen are these:—

The opposite-party instituted a suit for partition in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Alipur, sometime in 1921. A preliminary decree was made in August, 1921, a Commissioner was appointed and a final decree was passed on the 20th February, 1923. On an application for a review being made this decree was set aside and a fresh partition was ordered. The parties then agreed to refer all the disputes in the suit to arbitration. Sir Provash Mitter and his brother Sir Benode undertook this duty. It was agreed that the arbitrators might make separate awards from time to time.

• They made an award regarding the Calcutta properties. The parties as usual in these cases began to file various objections to the arbitrators' award. The arbitrators then refused to have anything more to do with them and the remaining properties which also formed part of the subject of the partition suit have not been dealt with by the arbitrators. The Court held that the award being only a partial award it could pass no decree on it. The Court, therefore, set aside the award and ordered the parties to take the necessary steps. The petitioner then moved this Court and obtained this Rule. His contention is that a decree can be made on a separate award and that hence the Judge in refusing to make a decree on the separate award has refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law.

So far as the present matter is concerned it is no doubt an interlocutory order in the suit and the view I have always taken is this that such an order cannot form subject of revision under s. 115, Civil Procedure Code. It is not, however, necessary to discuss this question, because whether or not an interlocutory order can form the subject of s. 115, Civil Procedure Code. I am quite satisfied that the present matter whether interlocutory or final order cannot form the subject of an application under s. 115. The argument put forward is this that the Judge wrongly decided that he could not pass a decree on a partial award. Hence he refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law and so the matter comes within the provision of s. 115. If this argument be accepted as far as I can see every error or law or fact can be converted or perverted into the subject of revision under s. 115.

I will give a few instances.

A Judge wrongly refused to admit a certain document in evidence holding that it was inadmissible in evidence. The document was admissible in evidence so the Court has jurisdiction to admit the document and as the result of wrongly deciding the document inadmissible he refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law. Or the Judge held wrongly that a suit was barred by the principle of res judicata and so would not take any further evidence and he dismissed the suit. Had he decided rightly that the suit was not barred by the principle of res judicata he would have taken evidence in it and, therefore, by wrongly deciding that the suit was barred by the principle of res judicata he refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law which was to take evidence and make a decree in favour of the plaintiff.

It is unnecessary to multiply instances. There would be no difficulty if once this principle were accepted in extending it to errors of fact. A Judge wrongly decides a question of fact and decrees a suit in favour of plaintiff. Had he decided it properly he would have given a decree in favour of defendant. Hence he did not exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law which was to give a decree in favour of defendant on account of his error of fact. In other words, every error of law or fact would be a refusal to exercise a jurisdiction or an exercise of a jurisdiction not vested in the Court. This seems to me to be merely a perversion of the word jurisdiction. Jurisdiction means the power of deciding. In the present case admittedly the Judge had the power to deal with or decide the case before him which was a suit for partition within his territorial and pecuniary jurisdiction. In exercising the power of decision he held that a decree could not be given on a partial award because he held the parties agreed to refer all matters to arbitration and did not agree to abide by the decision of the arbitrators if they decided only some and not all of the matters in dispute. He might be wrong and possibly he could have granted a decree on a partial award and he might have been mistaken as to what the agreement of the parties was in reference to arbitration. A number of rulings have been cited to show that he can. It is unnecessary for me to determine whether he can or cannot. It might be an error of law that he wrongly held he could not give a decree on a partial award or possibly an error of fact that the parties really agreed to have a decision on some of the matters in dispute and did not require that all the matters should be decided by the arbitrators. But in the exercise of a Court's jurisdiction to decide a question of law or fact wrongly is not to refuse to exercise a jurisdiction or to exercise it with material irregularity. As the Privy Council has pointed out in Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Baksh Singh (1) where a Court has jurisdiction to decide a case and does decide it whether it decides it rightly or wrongly it is immaterial. If it decided wrongly it did not exercise its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. In that case the present contention was not put forward that such exercise really amounted to a refusal to exercise its jurisdiction. It was only argued in that case that the Judge had acted with material irregularity. The present contention amounts to this that the Court by exercising its jurisdiction or power of decision wrongly refused to exercise its jurisdiction or power of deciding. In other words that to exercise jurisdiction is not to exercise jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to further pursue the argument.

In the present case the Judge had jurisdiction and he exercised it and held that he could not pass a decree on a partial award. He might be wrong but that would not give this Court power to interfere under s. 115.

I may here refer to the case of Kali Charan Sirdar v. Sarat Chunder Chowdhry (2) a case which in many respects is very nearly akin to the present case. Further if the Court had the power to interfere under s. 115 this is not a case in which the Court should interfere. The Judge has not finally decided the case. It is still open to the parties to ask for fresh arbitration if they so desire or to leave the case to be decided in the ordinary way. Further I may point out that when the case is finally decided it could still be made a ground of appeal that the Court should have accepted the award. I would, therefore, discharge this Rule. The Rule is discharged with costs. Hearing-fee ten gold mohurs.

Roy, J.—I regret to say that I differ from my learned brother in this matter. As my opinion cannot make any difference in the result of the case I will only indicate my reasons very briefly :

There was a preliminary decree in this partition suit and the parties thereafter agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. The arbitrators were given powers to give their award separately from time to time and it was agreed that Calcutta properties should be divided first by the arbitrators. They divided the Calcutta properties and gave an award in respect of these properties. On account of certain circumstances, the arbitrators refused to proceed any further with the partition. The learned Subordinate Judge has set aside this award in respect of the Calcutta properties and directed a Commissioner to make a fresh partition. The contention of the petitioner is that the order of the Subordinate Judge is in so far as it deals with the properties not dealt with by the arbitrators is good and the order in respect of the properties dealt with by the arbitrators is bad and should be set aside and that a decree should be made on the basis of the arbitrators' award. A question has arisen whether we can interfere with the learned Subordinate Judge's order in revision. The cases of Rudra Prasad Pande v. Mathura Prasad Ponde (3) and Chimanbhai Kalyanbhai v. Keshavlal Bulkhdas (4) amongst others were referred to where the learned Judges refused to interfere with the order setting aside the arbitration. These decisions appear to have proceeded from the point of view that the order of the lower Court was only an interlocutory order. It has been pointed out, however, by the learned Advocate for the petitioners that Piggott, J., who was a party in the Full Bench case of Buddhoo Lal v. Mewa Ram (5) interfered with an order wrongly superseding an arbitration in Husain Baksh v. Lachhman Das Mathra Das (6). On the other hand, the learned Advocate for the opposite party has referred to a decision of Maclean, C. J., in Kali Charan Sirdar v. Sarat Chunder Chowdhry (2) where the learned Judge refused to interfere with an order of the Small Cause Court in respect of an arbitration matter. It might be said that the last case was governed by the facts of that case. The Calcutta High Court seems to have taken ordinarily a view different from those of the High Courts of Bombay and Allahabad as to the meaning of the word "case" in s. 115, Civil Procedure Code, and has interfered in revision in many cases. Some of these cases have been collected or mentioned in the case of Salam Chand Kannayram v. Bhagawan Das Chilhama (7). The ground taken in these cases seems to have been that where there is likely to be grave injustice or injury this Court should interfere even with interlocutory orders and other orders from which there is no appeal. Several of these cases are mentioned in Salam Chand Kannayram v. Bhagawan Das Chilhama (7). In this particular case it is urged that the error in law of the Subordinate Judge has led him to assume a jurisdiction which he did not possess and the cases of Lachmi Narayan Marwary v. Balmakund Marwary (8), Birj Mohun Thakur v. Rai Uma Nath Chowdhury (9) and Umed Mal v. Chand Mal (10) have been referred to as examples where similar errors have been corrected. It is conceded by the learned Advocate for the opposite party that the arbitrators had power to make partial award but it is contended that the parties did not say that they would be bound by such partial award and the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge is a finding of fact with which we cannot interfere. It seems to me that the case must be decided on the construction of the terms of the reference which was made in the case. If the parties agreed to abide by the decision of the arbitrators in respect of the whole of the dispute and if the arbitrators had power to make partial award from time to time the award which they actually made must be effective and cannot be set aside in that way and a decree should follow on the award already made. It would seem to me that great hardship would result to the parties if they are asked to wait until the whole suit which began in 1921, and which may still be prolonged for a considerable time is finally decided and then to raise any debateable question by way of appeal against the final decision. With all due respect to my learned brother, I would say that this is a case in which we should interfere on the ground that the learned Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to deal with the properties in respect of which there had been effective award.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.FULL BENCH.

In the matter of Mr. S., SECOND GRADE
PLEADER, SOLINGHUR.

Legal Practitioners Act, (XVIII of 1879), s. 39—Pleader guilty of improper conduct but not of dishonesty—Penalty.

Where a Pleader who was in possession of money belonging to his client did not pay the amount to his client notwithstanding many demands, and ultimately when a complaint was launched under the Legal Practitioners Act against the Pleader he paid the money and put forward an explanation for non-payment which was not fully made out, but during the period when the proceedings under the Legal Practitioners Act were pending, he did not take out any sannad or practice :

Held, that the practitioner was guilty of improper conduct deserving severe censure though the conduct was not necessarily dishonest. [p. 98, col. 1.]

FACTS.—It was brought to the notice of the High Court by the District Judge of Chittoor, that Mr. S., a Second Grade Pleader of Sholinghur, in his capacity as the Pleader of one Senthamarai Ammal, the plaintiff in S. C. S. No. 592 of 1923, on the file of the Court of the District Munsif of Sholinghur, received from the defendant in the case the sums of Rs. 40 and Rs. 14 on 28th August, 1923, and 27th November, 1923, respectively and in spite of the repeated demands of his client and even after a registered notice addressed to and acknowledged by him on 17th December, 1924, he retained with him the said amounts for nearly three years. The High Court issued notice on 7th January, 1927, calling on the said Mr. S. to show cause why he should not be removed from the roll of Pleaders of Chittoor District or otherwise dealt with as the High Court may think fit.

Mr. K. S. Krishnaswami Ayyangar, for the Pleader.

The Advocate-General, for the Government.

JUDGMENT.—The charge against the Pleader in this case was that, having received two sums of money amounting in all to Rs. 54 from the defendant in a suit in which he was appearing for the plaintiff, he misappropriated it and converted it to his own use. The money was received at the end of 1923. Many demands were made upon him and he did not pay any attention to them. Ultimately, sometime in 1926 a complaint was launched under the Legal Practitioners Act against the Pleader and he then undoubtedly paid the money and he also put forward an explanation which the District Judge has found to be untrue, namely, that he had been asked by some relations—it is very difficult to make out which—of his clients to keep the money in order that it might be utilised in the purchase of stones for the construction of a temple which, I think, the client's father was supposed to have been building in Sholinghur. No body came forward to speak to the story one way or other. As I say, the learned Judge took the view that it was a mere story invented to stave off the evil day when it came; but it is fair to this man to say that the District Munsif, while not attempting to use it as a justification for what the Pleader did, apparently did think that there might have been some vague talk which reached him about the desirability of this money being applied to this purpose and that, no doubt, is why he found as he did, that the Pleader, whom after all he had seen and examined was not guilty of any fraudulent conduct. Nevertheless, he quite rightly held that, even on that showing he was guilty of improper conduct because he has never at any time pretended that he had instructions to withhold the money for that or any other purpose from his own client who instructed him. It has been brought to our notice by Mr. Krishnaswami Ayyangar who has very judiciously said all that can be said for him, and assented to by the Advocate General that for the whole of the year 1926 while these proceedings were hanging over his head he took out no sannad and, therefore, suspended himself as it were from pleading in the Court where his practice lay. The District Munsif says that he had before that been practising in the Court for 15 years and that, so far as he could ascertain, there had been no complaints against him. That appears in the report of the learned District Judge.

"The District Munsif reports that the Pleader has been practising in his Court for a period of 15 years and that there has been nothing against him."

None of these matters afford any real excuse for what he did, but we are going to take a lenient view of his case for two reasons not to any very considerable extent, because the sum of money was trifling but, first, because he has evinced some sense of propriety by not attempting to take out a sannad and seeking to practise while this matter was hanging over his head and he has thus in a way anticipated any sentence of suspension from practice which this Court might otherwise have passed upon him and in the next place, it may be that he had some muddled idea that these people did not really urgently want their money owing to this vague talk about the temple, and that may be sufficient warrant for the finding of the District Munsif that, however improper his conduct was, as it undoubtedly was, it was not necessarily dishonest. On that we are quite prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt. He knew perfectly he had no right to withhold the money in spite of demands, whatever the talk about temples or stories of temples or anything of the kind. The sentence of the Court is that the Pleader Mr. S. be severely censured for his conduct in this matter but that, having regard to the events that have happened, this Court does not think it necessary to inflict upon him any further sentence than he has inflicted upon himself of suspension from practice.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 1083 OF 1927.

*Present:—Mr. Justice Broadway.NATHA SINGH—ACCUSED—PETITIONER
versusEMPEROR—RESPONDENT.Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 193—Perjury—Denial of knowledge of fact—Proof that accused had personal knowledge, necessity of.

In the course of the examination of a prosecution witness he was asked whether the accused had arrested his sons, and the witness denied knowledge of the fact. In a prosecution of the witness for perjury it was proved that his sons had been arrested and that he had heard of the arrest, though he had no personal knowledge of the same:

Held, that the accused could not be convicted of an offence under s. 193 of the Penal Code, as there was no proof that the accused had personal knowledge of the fact. [p. 99, col. 1.]

Petition for revision of an order of the Sessions Judge, Ferozepur, dated 24th April, 1927.

• Dr. Nand Lal, for the Petitioner.• Mr. Sunder Das, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In 1925 a case was instituted by one Bahadur against Prem

Singh Head Constable and three others under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code. One of the prosecution witnesses in that case was Natha Singh, son of Sahib Singh, an old man between 75 and 80 years of age. In the course of his cross-examination he was asked whether the said Prem Singh Head Constable had his sons arrested in 1924, for taking part in the Akali movement, and that his son had been proceeded against, and only avoided conviction by apologizing. Natha Singh replied that he had no knowledge of this. The case against the Head Constable and his companions failed and subsequently proceedings under s. 193 of the Indian Penal Code were instituted against Natha Singh under the order of the District Magistrate.

Now, it appears that in January, 1924, Gulab Singh, the son of Natha Singh, was, as a matter of fact, arrested by or under the directions of Prem Singh, Head Constable, for taking part in the Akali movement and after proceedings had gone on for two months was released on his tendering an apology. It appears also that at the same time the nephew of Natha Singh was similarly arrested and released. The learned Magistrate who tried Natha Singh held, on the prosecution evidence, that Natha Singh was present in his village, when Gulab Singh, his son, was arrested and that, therefore, his statement made in 1926, was false to his knowledge and that the falsehood had been intentionally spoken. He accordingly convicted Natha Singh under s. 193 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced him to simple imprisonment for six months and to pay a fine of Rs. 500 or in default to undergo further rigorous imprisonment for six months. Natha Singh appealed to the learned Sessions Judge who maintained the conviction but reduced the sentence to imprisonment to the rising of the Court upholding the fine.

Natha Singh has come up to this Court under s. 439, Criminal Procedure Code, and it has been urged before me by Dr. Nand Lal that on the findings of the learned Sessions Judge the conviction cannot stand. A reference to the judgment of the learned Sessions Judge shows that the defence set up by Natha Singh was that he had two places of residence in two separate villages from 16 to 20 kos apart and that at the time when his son is said to have been arrested he himself was in another village where he had been staying for three months collecting his share of the produce from his tenants. He also said that although there has been no formal separation and partition of land between him and his son they, as a matter of fact, lived apart and were not on visiting terms. While for the prosecution witnesses were produced to prove that Natha Singh was in the village where his son was arrested, defence witnesses were produced who have sworn that Natha Singh was in his other village and had been there for about three months. The learned Magistrate accepted the evidence given by the prosecution witnesses, but the learned Sessions Judge has apparently been unable to agree for he says as follows:—"I agree with the Magistrate that it is extremely unlikely that appellant (Natha Singh) by the time he gave evidence on the 12th February, 1926, had not learnt of his son's affair. He describes himself on that date as a lambardar. It is possible that what he meant to convey was that he had no direct knowledge of his son's arrest and prosecution. His presence at the time is not conclusively proved." He then goes on to say:—"There is, however, a 'suppressio veri,' three questions appear to have been addressed to him on the point and the opportunity of saying that he had heard of his son's arrest, and prosecution was not apparently denied him."

Now, what Natha Singh was asked was whether he knew that his sons had been arrested. The learned Sessions Judge has found that it has not been proved conclusively that he was present in the village at the time of the arrest. Natha Singh, therefore, obviously could not have had any personal knowledge of the arrest and the most he could have said was that he had heard of it. Again, in order to make the statement relevant to the case in which it was made the important point was whether the arrest had been made by the Head Constable Prem Singh, a fact that seems to have been made somehow lost sight of by the learned Sessions Judge.

It not having been proved that Natha Singh had any personal knowledge of the arrest of his son by Prem Singh in 1924, the mere fact that he probably heard of it between 1924 and 1926, is not, in my opinion sufficient to warrant his conviction on the charge laid against him. I, therefore, accept this petition and setting aside the conviction and sentence direct that the fine, if paid, be refunded.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 526—Officials of district connected with case—Transfer of case, desirability of.

Where a number of officials in the district in which an accused is being prosecuted are personally concerned in the case, whether as witnesses or otherwise, it is desirable that it should be tried elsewhere.

Criminal miscellaneous application for transfer of a case from the Court of the Magistrate, Moradabad.

Mr. Kailash Nath Katju, for the Applicant.

Mr. U. S. Bajpai, for the Crown.

ORDER.—This is an application for transfer of a case from the Court of Mr. Gokaran Nath Ugra, a Magistrate at Moradabad. It is unnecessary to enter into details either of the allegations in the affidavit or of any other matters beyond this: that there can be no shadow of a doubt but that some of the district officials at Moradabad have been unavoidably or otherwise very closely connected with this case. The District Magistrate himself approves of the transfer of the case, while, at the same time he points out that his personal concern with it only originated in the fact that allegations were being made "of the possibility of murder and suicide." This order of transfer must not be taken as in any way a reflection upon any body concerned with the case, whether official or non-official. I order it simply on the ground that where a number of officials in the district are personally concerned as in the circumstances of this case whether as witnesses or otherwise in the case, it is desirable that it should be tried elsewhere, and the District Magistrate himself says that he sees the propriety of this. The transfer is opposed by the complainant, and it is a matter of regret if the complainant is put to further expense by the transfer; but I have to weigh the several considerations in the case, and I have no hesitation in holding that the case should be transferred. On behalf of the applicant it is agreed that the case may be taken up by the new Magistrate from the stage at which it has at present arrived, and that such evidence as has already been taken need not be taken de novo.

I accordingly transfer the case from the Court of the Magistrate at Moradabad to the Court of the District Magistrate of Bareilly, who will proceed to try the case himself from the stage which it has reached, or direct such trial by such experienced Magistrate as he may deem fit.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V. of 1898), ss. 14, 154, 155, 162, 164, 197—Appointment of Magistrate to try a case—'Case,' whether includes all charges—Sanction to prosecute—Mistake as to date of offence, effect of—Preliminary inquiry by Criminal Investigation Officer—Statement of witnesses, whether falls within s. 162—Accused's right to copies—Magistrate's power to record statements of witnesses under s. 164—Misuse of statement under s. 162, effect of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 145, 154—Power of Court to allow witness to be treated as hostile—Revision—Interference—Evidence of hostile witness, whether should be rejected wholly—Criminal trial—Respectable accused—Sentence.

A 'case' is not necessarily a single charge but comprises all charges or classes of charges. A Magistrate upon whom authority is conferred under s. 14 of the Criminal Procedure Code to try the case relating to the prosecution of a particular person is, therefore, empowered to try all the charges that may be laid against that person in that prosecution. [p. 101, col. 2.]

A mistake as to the date of commission of an offence in an order granting sanction under s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code for prosecution in respect of such offence will not necessarily vitiate the trial unless it has caused prejudice to the accused. In granting sanction under the section the Government need not specify the offence with the same degree of precision as in a charge. [p. 102, col. 1.]

Statements taken by a Criminal Investigation Officer in a preliminary enquiry conducted by him against a public officer before sanction for prosecution was given and he was ordered by a Magistrate to investigate under s. 155 (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code, are not statements falling within the purview of s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code. To all intents and purposes they are on a par with statements made in a departmental enquiry, and the accused is not entitled to copies of such statements. [p. 102, col. 2.]

Similarly, statements recorded by a Magistrate in such a preliminary inquiry at the instance of the Criminal Investigation Officer do not fall within the purview of s. 164 of the Code. [p. 102, col. 2; p. 103, col. 1.]

Section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code is not confined to confession of the accused but applies also to statements taken from witnesses, and although it is not desirable that witnesses should be pinned down by statements under s. 164, recording statements of witnesses under that section is not illegal. [p. 103, col. 2.]

It is open to a Court to grant permission to a party calling a witness to treat the witness as hostile and to cross-examine him if it finds that the witness is equivocating, and a Court of revision will not ordinarily interfere with the discretion exercised in this matter by the trial Court. [ibid.]

The legal result of treating a witness as hostile is not to discredit his evidence in toto, and the party calling him is entitled to rely on those portions of his evidence upon which he wishes to rely, and it is for the Court in the particular circumstances of each case to credit or to discredit the different portions of his evidence. [p. 104, cols. 1 & 2.]

Bradley v. Ricardo (16), relied on.

Khajiruddin v. Emperor (15), not followed.

The misuse of a statement under s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code is not, in the absence of prejudice to the accused, sufficient to vitiate a trial. [p. 107, col. 2.]

Per Madgavkar, J.—The law is not a respecter of persons; and a respectable person as such must not escape with a lesser sentence. [p. 106, col. 2.]

Criminal applications against an order of the Sessions Judge, Surat, varying that of the Special Magistrate, First Class, at Surat.

Mr. G. N. Thakor (with him Mr. K. N. Koyajee), for the Accused.

Mr. Velinker (with him Mr. P. B. Shingne, Government Pleader), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Madgavkar, J.—The accused, Jehangir Ardeshir Rustumji Cama, a Deputy Collector under suspension, was convicted by the Special First Class Magistrate, Mr. Willis, under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code on three charges in this case and sentenced to simple imprisonment for three months and a fine of Rs. 500, in default two months' further simple imprisonment on each of the first two charges, and six months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000, in default further three months' simple imprisonment on the third charge.

the sentences to run consecutively. In appeal he was acquitted in respect of the third charge, and the convictions and sentences on the first two charges were maintained. He has applied in revision to this Court against his convictions and sentences. Government have also applied to enhance the sentences. The result is that under s. 439 (6) of the Code of Criminal Procedure the accused, as he was entitled, has exercised his right to show causes against his convictions. Confining myself to the first case and the two charges which are known as the Harangam and Sadarvel cases, Mr. Thakor for Cama has taken us exhaustively through the record, pointed out to us the discrepancies and the improbabilities, and has also minutely argued each point of law. Mr. Velinker for the Crown has confined himself to the broad aspects of the case and relied in the main on the judgments of the Magistrate and the Sessions Court.

Before entering into the points of law taken, it will be convenient shortly to state the history of the case. Mr. Macmillan, the District Magistrate of Surat, under whom the accused was working as Deputy Collector and Sub-Divisional Officer, Southern Division, communicated with the Criminal Investigation Department. The Deputy Inspector General placed Mr. Kothavalla, on January 21, 1925, at the disposal of Mr. Macmillan to make a confidential enquiry and submit a report. He made his inquiries from March to May and recorded the statements of certain witnesses. Their statements were also recorded at his request in March by Mr. Dullabhbbhai, a Mamlatdar and Magistrate of the Bulsar Taluka. Subsequently, in August, 1925, Government, under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, issued the necessary sanctions. Mr. Kothavalla then lodged formal complaints before Mr. Jayakar, Acting District Magistrate. Mr. Jayakar ordered Mr. Kothavalla, under s. 155 (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to hold an investigation. Mr. Kothavalla thereupon recorded again these statements and some others and again sent up certain witnesses to Mr. Narandas Mehta, who had succeeded Mr. Dullabhbbhai, for recording their statements. The accused had been imprisoned in July. His trial commenced in December, 1925, and ended in April, 1926. He appealed, and was released on the same day on bail by the Court of Session. His appeals were decided in October, 1926, with the result stated above. With this preliminary history I proceed at once to consider in their order the various points of law raised.

The first point has reference to the order of Government, Ex. 28 (L), under s. 14, Criminal Procedure Code, appointing Mr. Willis to try "the case." It was argued that this authority to try "the case" does not make Mr. Willis competent to try three charges. It may be conceded perhaps that it would have been preferable if the order had explicitly run, "the case or cases." At the same time a case is not necessarily a single charge. It comprises all charges or classes of charges. In construing this order as in construing any other document, a reasonable construction must be placed, and the question asked, what was the intention of the person responsible for the order, how far that intention clearly appears, and whether there is any real ambiguity such as to mislead or prejudice any of the parties concerned. Section 14 expressly authorises the Magistrate to try cases or class of cases. In this view, so far as the present case of two charges is concerned, I see no difficulty. This was the first case Mr. Willis tried, and he had ample authority to include in it the three charges, which were legally comprised within that case. The fact that Government appointed no other Magistrate and appointed Mr. Willis "to try the case relating to the prosecution of Mr. J. A. R. Cama" shows that Government intended that Mr. Willis should try the present charges, and expressed themselves to that effect. The contention, therefore, fails.

The second objection relates to the sanction under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, Ex. 28 (F), page 517, and the words therein, "in the month of February" amended on January 26th, 1925, (page 523) by adding the words "or March (March 1, 1924)." It appears that in respect of the offence referred to in this sanction the books of the goldsmith at Navsari showed a purchase on Saturday, Magh Vad 10th Sambat 1980. A reference to authoritative Government diaries shows that Magh Vad 10th Sambat 1980, was shown as Friday, February 29th, 1924. And the prosecution, somewhat hastily, perhaps, assumed and proceeded from the sanction onwards on the assumption that the Saturday was a mistake and that the correct date was the English date shown in the Government diaries as corresponding to Magh Vad 10th Sambat 1880, viz., February 29, Friday. In the course of the trial, however, the prosecution decided that this assumption was a mistake and that the Saturday was correct, and that the confusion was due to the confused system of the Hindu calendars and lunar years; and the charge was altered from the original February 29, to March 1st. Proceedings were stayed and the sanction amended as above. Under these circumstances it is contended for Cama that the previous sanction was, so to speak, null and void and with it all the proceedings held thereunder end up to the amended sanction.

It is perfectly correct that under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure no Court could take cognisance of these offences except with the previous sanction of Government. The questions in regard to these sanctions are: Is the offence designated [Queen-Empress v. Samavir (1)] or is there any vagueness about it [Emperor v. Madhav Laxman (2)]? Applying again to this objection the same principles applied in regard to the order of appointment of Mr. Willis it appears that there is really no vagueness about the sanction. The other details specified make it clear that the offence charged and enquired into was what it was throughout alleged to be. I agree that in granting sanction Government need not specify the offences with the same degree of precision as in a charge: Girwardhari Lal v. Emperor (3). Had there been two offences, one on February 29, and another on March 1, the objection might have been valid; but as throughout the question is only of a single offence, which is otherwise properly described and specified, the sanction is not, in our opinion, bad. At the same time it may be conceded it would have been preferable if the sanction like the charge had used the words, "on or about" and not merely the word "on" or if the prosecution had been from the outset more careful whether it was Friday, February 29, or Saturday March 1, that the gold was alleged to have been purchased and given. More-ever, the defence had reserved their cross-examination, and did not cross-examine any of the witnesses till after the charge. It is difficult to see what prejudice was caused to the defence.

The third objection relates to s. 360 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and two rulings of the Calcutta High Court, Hira Lal Ghosh v. Emperor (4) and Dargahi v. Emperor (5), have been cited in support. My learned brother invited the attention of Counsel to the very recent Privy Council case, Abdul Rahman v. Emperor (6), overruling these two cases. It is not, therefore, necessary to consider the previous decisions, which will all be found in Ramesh Chandra Das v. Emperor (7) or to my judgment in Pitoomal v. Emperor (8) where I differed from the Calcutta view.

The last objection refers to the procedure of the Police and of the Magistrates, and particularly to statements recorded by both before the trial and their use. As regards the statements recorded by Mr. Kothavalla from March to May, 1925, before the Government sanctioned for prosecution, and before the District Magistrate ordered him to investigate the offences: these statements recorded by Mr. Kothavalla were not statements under s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, because there was no investigation within the meaning of the term, "during the course of the investigation" under s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code. To all intents and purposes they were on a par with the statements recorded in a departmental enquiry: Queen-Empress v. Karigowda (9). The witnesses were not bound to answer, and their ignorance of this fact does not affect the legal position.

Similarly the statements recorded by Mr. Dullabhbhai in March, 1925. Government had sanctioned no complaint and they were not made "in the course of an in-investigation or at any time afterwards" under s. 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, nor were the witnesses bound to answer. As to the propriety of these statements, speaking for myself, I find it difficult to see how Mr. Kothavalla could have made a report without recording the statements made to him. Even Mr. Thakor, who in other respects has pressed his arguments for the defence to the utmost possible extreme, has not suggested that Mr. Kothavalla could be expected to carry in his memory these statements without a written record of them.

It might be argued, however, with greater plausibility that the propriety of the statements before Mr. Dullabhbhai is more open to question, looked at from a purely judicial point of view. These confidential enquiries are in their nature difficult and delicate. What ever Mr. Kothavalla's reasons were, whether he desired to protect himself from allegations such as were subsequently made against his Assistant, Mr. Billimoria, or whether he was not sure of these witnesses, and particularly in view of the fact that evidence has been adduced of attempts by the defence to tamper with witnesses such as the visit of the son-in-law of the main witness Adam Isap to Mr. Gandhi the Counsel for the accused (I desire to add that there is no imputation whatever made against Mr. Gandhi)—in the face of all those circumstances I confess myself unable to condemn the taking of the witnesses before Mr. Dullabhbhai, provided the witnesses were not taken there against their will. The Courts may not tolerate any breach of the law; but they must also be alive to the realities and difficulties in cases such as the present when it has to be discovered whether allegations of corruption are idle rumour or malice or whether there is any substratum of truth in them.

But the statements recorded by Mr. Kothavalla after Mr. Jayakar's order under s. 155 (2) clearly fall under s. 162, Criminal Procedure Code. Nothing can be said against their legality or their propriety.

The statements recorded by Mr. Naranadas Mehta fall under s. 164. The Calcutta High Court has held [Queen-Empress v. Jadub Dass (10) and Emperor v. Nuri Sheikh (11)] that it is hardly desirable that witnesses should be pinned down by statements under s. 164, and that Sessions Judge should not admit them under s. 283 without making proper enquiry. The very fact that such statements are recorded under s. 164 leads to a presumption on the showing of the prosecution itself that these witnesses are weak. At the same time s. 164 is not confined to confessions of the accused. If then the Police take the risk, and their action is not outside the law, it is difficult to see how the Courts can prevent or discourage their so doing. In the present case it is only fair to add that there are no allegations of ill-treatment in the real sense of the term against the Police.

The next objection is that the prosecution sought and were allowed to treat as hostile their own witnesses when they chose and previous statements were put to them and in re-examination they were really cross-examined.

It appears that in some matters considered important by the prosecution, the evidence before the trying Magistrate of certain witnesses differed from their previous statements. The prosecution sought to obtain leave under s. 154 of the Indian Evidence Act to treat these witnesses as hostile. The Magistrate evidently thought that these witnesses were at least equivocating. It was open to him under the law to grant the permission sought. In Kalachand Sircar v. Queen Empress (12) it was held that a witness is not hostile merely because he tells at Sessions a different story from that before the Committing Magistrate. But it is difficult for this Court sitting in revision and not seeing the witnesses or their demeanour to say that the trying Court was wrong. At the best it merely amounted to permission to the prosecution to put leading questions.

As to questions about these previous statements, the statements themselves, in virtue of s. 162 as now amended could not be put to them by the prosecution: Vithu Balu Kharat v. Emperor (13). Mr. Velinker frankly and very properly conceded and expressed his regret that in the case of one witness, Ex. 6 (page 241), he wrongly asked the Magistrate to allow questions on such a statement. But as regards the other witnesses, they were questioned on statements made by them before Mr. Dullabhbhai.

bhai. Copies of these statements or of those recorded in March by Mr. Kothavalla were apparently not supplied to the defence but a copy of statements recorded from September onwards both before the Police and the Magistrate were so supplied. No authority is shown to entitle the defence to the statements recorded prior to August. From the judgment of the learned Sessions Judge it appears as a matter of fact that there was little or no difference between the statements before August and the statements afterwards.

It follows, as regards the statements before Mr. Dullabhbhai, from the strictly legal point of view that they would fall under ss. 145, 147 of the Indian Evidence Act and not under s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The propriety of questions on these statements, however, is a more difficult question. On the one hand the prosecution adduced evidence to prove attempts by or for the accused to tamper with the witnesses. On the other hand it might be argued that the practical result of questions on these statements was to nullify the provisions of s. 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; and these provisions have been deliberately enacted by the Legislature and are entitled to respect not merely in the letter but also in the spirit so long as the section remains unamended.

Cases such as the present in which one set of statements is recorded before investigation and another after, are, however, rare. Under these circumstances and bearing in mind the peculiar difficulty and delicacy of such inquiries, I do not think it necessary to pursue the question of propriety any further.

As to the legal consequence, the prosecution sought to discredit the statements of witnesses they considered hostile only on certain points. It is contended for the defence that the legal result was to discredit the evidence in toto of these witnesses including those portions on which the prosecution wished to rely. This view is founded on the dictum of Lord Campbell, C. J., in Faulkner v. Brine (14) accepted by the Calcutta High Court in cases such as Khajiruddin v. Emperor (15). But as was pointed out in the lower Courts, the view of Lord Campbell is not accepted even in England: Bradley v. Ricardo (16); Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. XIII, p. 600. It does not find support in any provision of the Indian Evidence Act or other enactment in India. With all respect, therefore, I am unable to say that the total discarding of the evidence of such witnesses can be formulated as a necessary legal result, amounting in fact to falsus in uno falsus in omnibus. If it cannot be so formulated, then the result must be the same as in other cases; and it must be a matter for the Court on the particular facts in each case to credit or to discredit the different portions of the evidence of each witness as in other cases.

The other objections are less serious. On the general question of latitude enough has been said to show the difficulty experienced by both sides. The Magistrate rightly gave each side full opportunity to elaborate its case. To the objection that the re-examination was in the nature of a cross-examination, the reply was that it was an explanation of certain portions of the cross-examination. The difficulty really arose from certain witnesses being treated as hostile. There is no substance in the argument of prejudice to the defence. They apparently desired to reserve cross-examination of each witness after all the witnesses had completed their examination-in-chief. The charge was framed and all the witnesses were recalled and cross-examined. How the defence or the Court would have been any better off by recalling all the witnesses immediately before the charge and again immediately after, I am unable to understand. The forty hearings and the record of 600 pages are mainly taken up by the cross-examination for the defence, which is as exhaustive as it well could be.

Again it was suggested that the case should have been adjourned to enable the defence to put Mr. Macmillan into the box. Mr. Macmillan was on leave in England. He did not return until October 6, 1926. He is not alleged to have any knowledge himself of the charges or to have questioned any of the witnesses. The rumours he might or might not have heard would not be admissible in evidence. The Magistrate was right in declining to adjourn the case for six months to enable the defence to examine Mr. Macmillan.

On considering all these objections in detail I arrive at the conclusion that there has been no failure of justice within the meaning of s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure such as to vitiate the trial. Subject to the remarks above, the prosecution and the Magistrate appear to me to have treated the defence very fairly and given the accused every facility. He has fully availed himself of it as shown by the mass of materials and the time occupied by arguments on his behalf in all the Courts. Even the application for enhancement of sentence has enabled him to argue the case afresh on the merits before us.

I pass on to these merits. In so doing it is impossible for me to take up each discrepancy pointed out on his behalf, nor is it necessary to consider each minute point such as the number of carts when the witnesses returned on January 18, 1924, from Athgam to Harangam, or the nature and number of the tents occupied by the accused on January 20, 1924. One Adam Isap Patel of Harangam states that he gave the accused ten tolas of gold on two occasions, once at Athgam on January 28, 1924, in order to get the accused to appoint him Patel of Harangam, and again at Jalalpor on March 1, 1924, in order to get his friend Dayalji appointed Patel of Sardarvel. Certain pieces of corroborative evidence are brought forward. First and on January 18, that the accused's servant Chand beckoned to Adam and took him to the accused and the accused demanded the gold; and Adam on his way back to Harangam informed some of his companions of the accused's demand; and, secondly, that Adam purchased the gold at Bulsar on January 20, and at once took it to the accused's camp. Similarly, in the second case (Sardarvel), that on the night of February 27 Adam saw the accused at Jalalpor at a bungalow called the Khoja's bungalow between 9 and 10 o'clock at night and asked him to appoint Dayalji, whereupon the accused demanded ten tolas of gold. Secondly, that Adam informed Dayalji, and obtained from him the necessary amount; thirdly, that Adam taking with him the witness Ismail Isaf (Ex. 6) went to Navsari on Saturday, March 1, purchased the ten tolas of gold and returned to the accused's camp and gave it to him some time shortly after 10 o'clock in the morning. The defence is generally that the entire story is a fabrication, the result of a conspiracy on the part of some subordinates of the accused because he had been unduly strict; and more particularly, a defence of alibi that at the particular hours alleged by Adam the accused was not at Athgam on January 20, or at Jalalpor on March 1.

The question, therefore, in both the charges is how far Adam's evidence that he gave the accused the gold on these two occasions is or is not worthy of acceptance.

Adam is undoubtedly in law an accomplice, and there is no other eye-witness to the alleged payments. It is even argued by Mr. Thakor that the persons who are said to have accompanied Adam in the purchase of gold are accomplices in law, to say nothing of the witnesses treated as hostile, and, therefore, unreliable. This is an extreme contention, for which there is no authority. I do not propose to add to the case-law on the subject of accomplices. Their name is legion. Instead of being treated as applications of the law as laid down in s. 114 of the Indian Evidence Act with ill. (b), and the further illustration as to ill. (b), they are taken as adding to or subtracting from the law. I accept the enunciation of the law in Govind Balwant Laghate v. Emperor (17).

It is clear, however, that the single word accomplice may cover various categories. The extent and depth of the taint may vary greatly. The part taken by the accomplice, his interest in minimising his own share at the expense of the accused, the moral element, all these and other factors would gravely affect the total amount of the legal taint. Even in cases such as the present, there is assuredly a difference between a rich man tempting a poor public servant and a public servant presumed to be above corruption extorting money from a subordinate subject to his own power, in order to show him favour. Even in this very case the first charge to which the accused is alleged to have demanded money and the second in which Adam of his own accord went to recommend Dayalji suggest a certain amount of difference. I content myself with holding that in law Adam and Dayalji are the only two accomplices and that the other witnesses are subject to no such taint. The question whether Adam and Dayalji are or are not to be believed must depend on

Without reiterating what has been said in the judgments below, the difficulty, speaking for myself, which I have experienced in appreciating the arguments for the accused is this. It may be there are a number of discrepancies. But the further point which must always be in the mind of the Court is this, what follows from these discrepancies? Are they the discrepancies of bona fide and truthful witnesses, or are they the discrepancies of false witnesses and conspirators? In this particular case even when their statements were first recorded by Mr. Kothavalla the witnesses were asked to speak to events over a year old; and when they gave evidence before the Magistrate, more than two years had elapsed. Many incidents were such that there would not be any particular reason for the details remaining in the minds of these witnesses. Each witness had undergone four examinations before he came into Court. In Court some were treated as hostile by both sides and examined and cross-examined at great length. Under these circumstances, the simple fact of discrepancy does not suffice. And in a record of this length there always appears to me to be a danger of not seeing the wood for the trees. [His Lordship then referred to the evidence and continued:—] The result is that the lower Courts were, in my opinion, right in finding the accused guilty.

There remains the difficult question of sentence. The main ground on which enhancement is sought is that these are cases very difficult to detect, and false and reckless allegations of conspiracy, perjury and forgery have been made by the accused. As regards the latter ground, although it might in certain cases be an element in so far as it is a part of the defence, I would be reluctant to allow the sentence to be aggravated by it. The single point taken by the learned Magistrate is the ruin pecuniary and social of the accused which the sentence involves. From the point of view of the individual accused that is, no doubt, correct. But, on the other hand, there are certain other elements, public and more important, which it is impossible to ignore. In these cases it is not merely a question of the amount that is taken; nor are they on a par with the case of a breach of trust by a private employee. The accused occupied an official position, and a position of public trust. The higher that position, the more serious is the breach, and the heavier, in my opinion, should be the sentence. The law must not be respecter of persons; and a respectable person as such may not escape with a lesser sentence. In the present case it is not for us to ask ourselves why this application for enhancement has been made. It might be that but for the acquittal on the third charge it might not have been made. But however that may be, I am constrained, reluctantly yet clearly, to the conclusion that there are certain points in the case which justify this application. The record leaves small doubt that since the accused came to this district and was entrusted as Deputy Collector with the charge of the southern division, he embarked on a career of unblushing corruption. I am unable to make the distinction argued on his behalf between Deputy Collectors not acting in their magisterial capacity and Subordinate Judges. In these cases the wrong is not confined to the person who paid the bribe; the wrong is to the Government and the public. It sullies and makes a breach in the tradition of probity which other public servants have built up with years of labour. It affords a handle to the unthinking and the hostile against the administration and the particular service to which he belongs. Under these circumstances after making every allowance for the various considerations put forward on his behalf, I am of opinion that the sentences passed are inadequate. I would enhance them on each of the two charges as follows; six months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 500, in default two months further rigorous imprisonment, the sentences to be consecutive, and the sentences of simple imprisonment undergone being considered as part of these sentences.

Crump, J.—The exhaustive judgment which my learned brother has just delivered saves me the task of dealing with the various points that have arisen in this case at any length. So far as the merits are concerned I agree entirely with the conclusions that he has reached. Speaking for myself, dealing as we are with a case under s. 439, I should be content to express my agreement with the conclusions arrived at by the two Courts below who have dealt with the facts of these two charges in full and adequate judgments. But if it is necessary to say more than that, then all that is necessary to say has been said in the judgment which has just been delivered, and I do not propose to add anything to it. So far as the questions of law are concerned which have been raised in this case I desire to make a few remarks. First as to the order under s. 14 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The words used in the order are as follows: "To try the case relating to the prosecution of Mr. J. A. R. Cama, Deputy Collector under suspension." Those words must be interpreted in the light of the facts in relation to which they are used. The accused was suspended on June 25, 1924, and on August 21, 1924, his prosecution was sanctioned under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The order sanctioning his prosecution dealt with all four cases with which we are concerned in the present proceedings, and it is, in my opinion, reasonable to suppose that the words which I have quoted from the order under s. 14 are used with reference to that which had gone before, and are meant to cover the four charges for which this prosecution had been sanctioned by the Government. That is, in my opinion, the reasonable interpretation of those words, and I may point out that the word 'case,' so far as I am aware, has no strict technical meaning, and is used in a compendious sense as covering all charges which may arise against an accused person. The order, I agree, is not happily expressed, but I think that its words, fairly interpreted, are wide enough to confer upon the Magistrate jurisdiction to try all those charges for which the sanction of Government had already been given.

Then as regards the question of sanction under s. 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the fact is that the sanction is expressed to be for an offence committed in the month of February, and in the margin of the sanction the date given is February 29. What happened has been explained in my learned brother's judgment. Now under s. 197 the local Government is not in my judgment bound to state the precise day on which the offence for which sanction is given has taken place. They have elected to do so here, and I think unwisely, but in all other respects the offence for which the accused has been tried is in every detail the offence for which the sanction was given, and the true light in which to regard the matter is this. The Government in sanctioning the prosecution of the accused erroneously described it as having taken place on February 29. When that error was discovered and it was an error that it would perhaps have been difficult to foresee arising as it did from a discrepancy in the Hindu and English calendar, they issued what was not in truth a fresh sanction, but was no more than an erratum correcting the mistake in the date in the sanction they had already given. That is the light in which I look upon this matter, and it appears to me that there was throughout these proceedings one offence and one only for which the prosecution of the accused was directed under s. 197, and that, therefore, even apart from the issue of that erratum, it would have been competent to the Magistrate, holding that the offence took place on March 1 and not on February 29, to have tried the case upon that understanding without any further sanction from the local Government.

Then as regards the statements under s. 162 I wish to say that I agree with the view expressed by my learned brother that the statements recorded by Mr. Kothavalla in the confidential enquiry are not within the scope of s. 155. With reference to that I would wish to point out what is Mr. Kothavalla's position with reference to this case. He is an officer of the Criminal Investigation Department and not an officer in charge of a Police station within the meaning of s. 154, and the suggestion that as soon as he received information from the District Magistrate he must be held to have been empowered to investigate by an order under s. 155 appears to me to miss the mark and overlook that which really took place according to the evidence. What the District Magistrate did was not to direct an enquiry under s. 155. He asked an officer of the Criminal Investigation Department to make confidential enquiries for the purpose of ascertaining whether any grounds existed for instituting criminal proceedings. That being so, it is impossible to argue that the various statements recorded before the order under s. 155 was issued by Mr. Jayakar falls under s. 162 of the Code. Then as regards the misuse of the statements under s. 162, that misuse is now conceded, but it seems to me impossible to hold that it is sufficient to vitiate the trial. The point in my judgment is covered by s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and in the absence of any prejudice to the accused, and there was no prejudice as my learned brother has explained, there is no basis on which sitting as a Court of revision we can set aside the proceedings of the Courts below. That is all that I wish to say as regards the questions of law arising in this case, and I will only add a few remarks as regards the enhancement of the sentence.

It is with much reluctance that I consent to the exercise of our powers under s. 439 to enhance the sentences in these cases, but I do so because I conceive that it is our plain duty to do so. The accused held a responsible public position and exercised wide powers. He abused that position; and he abused it in a way which shows that he was disposed to corruption when an opportunity offered itself. In such a case the sentence passed by the Magistrate is not adequate to the gravity of the offence. It is impossible when such offences as this come to light and when we are asked to mark our sense of their gravity that we should abstain from doing so. And thus, though I say I do it with reluctance, I conceive it to be my duty to substitute for the sentence passed by the Magistrate the sentence which my learned brother has set out in his judgment. I will only add this that in estimating that sentence of rigorous imprisonment we direct that any sentence of simple imprisonment which the accused has already undergone should be regarded as having been rigorous imprisonment and deducted from the term now imposed.

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

August 14, 1927.

Present :—Mr. Justice Tek Chand.

SAMMAN SINGH—ACCUSED—PETITIONER
versus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 514—Surety bond—Failure of surety to produce accused on day fixed for appearance—Magistrate not holding Court on that day—Bond, whether forfeited.

The failure of a surety to produce an accused on the day on which he has undertaken to produce him will not cause forfeiture of his bond, where the Judge does not hold Court on that day.

Case reported by the District Magistrate,

Amritsar, with his No. 93477/1924, dated the 12th February, 1927.

REPORT.—FACTS.—In the case of Pal Singh and Saudagar Singh etc., under s. 497/498, Indian Penal Code, the accused Samman Singh and Kesar Singh stood sureties to produce certain persons in Court on 2nd June, 1925; but they failed to do so. Hence they were ordered to pay Rs. 1,000 each by way of penalty under s. 514, Criminal Procedure Code.

The accused, on conviction by Sardar Arur Singh exercising the powers of a Magistrate of the First Class in the Amritsar District were sentenced, by order dated 6th February, 1926, under s. 514 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to pay Rs. 1,000 each as penalty.

GROUND.—This is an application for revision of order passed under s. 514, Criminal Procedure Code, by Sardar Arur Singh, Magistrate, First Class, forfeiting the amount of security given by the applicants for the appearance in the Court of certain persons, on the ground that on 2nd June, 1925, they did not produce these persons in Court.

I am satisfied that good reasons exist for the delay in putting this application. I recommend that it be taken into consideration on the following grounds:

1. That on 2nd June, 1925, the Court before which appearance was to be made did not in point of fact sit; and

2. that in the case of Kesar Singh appellant no personal bond had been taken from the person for whom he was asked to give security. Therefore, it is argued that no bond should be taken from him as a surety's liability cannot be greater than his principal.

Note : No amount has yet been realized.

Lala Faqir Chand and Lala Har Pershad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Raj Krishna, for Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—On the 16th of May, 1925, one Pal Singh lodged a complaint under ss. 497-498, Indian Penal Code, against Saudagar Singh and Mussamat Guro. Bailable warrants for Rs. 1,000 were issued against both Saudagar Singh and Mussamat Guro for appearance in Court on the 2nd of June, 1925. These warrants were served on the 23rd of May, 1925, on which date Samman Singh and Kesar Singh petitioners executed bonds undertaking to produce the accused persons before the Court on the 2nd of June, 1925.

It appears that on the 2nd of June, 1925, the Magistrate Sardar Arur Singh did not hold his Court but had gone to Gurdaspur. The Reader made a note on the record that Pal Singh complainant was present but that the accused persons were absent, that the warrants had not been received back after service and that the case should come up on the 6th of June, 1925. The complaint was ultimately withdrawn by Pal Singh on receipt of Rs. 1,800 from Saudagar Singh.

The Magistrate Sardar Arur Singh took proceedings under s. 514, Criminal Procedure Code, against the two petitioners who had, as already mentioned, undertaken to produce them in Court on the 2nd of June, 1925, and ordered that the amount of the security be forfeited. On revision, the learned District Magistrate, Amritsar, has forwarded the proceedings to this Court with a recommendation that the order of forfeiture be set aside. After hearing Mr. Fakir Chand for the petitioners and Mr. Raj Krishna for the Crown I am of opinion that the recommendation of the District Magistrate must be accepted and Sardar Arur Singh's order of forfeiture set aside. The Magistrate did not hold his Court on the 2nd of June, 1925, the only date on which the petitioners had undertaken to produce the accused persons. When the Magistrate himself was not holding his Court the accused were under no obligation to appear nor the sureties under any obligation to produce them. I, therefore, accept the petition and set aside the order of the Magistrate forfeiting the amount of the security of Rs. 1,000 each furnished by each of the petitioners.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 195 (a) —Offence committed before Commissioner appointed by Court—Power of Court to make complaint—Commissioner, status of.

A Court which has appointed a Commissioner to examine accounts is competent to make a valid complaint under s. 195 (a) of the Criminal Procedure Code in respect of an offence committed by a person before the Commissioner under s. 179 of the Penal Code. A Commissioner is a public servant subordinate to the Court which appointed him.

Criminal application for revision against an order of the Sessions Judge, Satara, confirming that of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, First Class, at Satara.

Mr. Ambedkar (with him Mr. K. A. Padhye), for the Applicant.

Mr. P. B. Shingne, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner Nana Khanderao has been convicted under s. 179, Indian Penal Code, for refusing to answer questions put to him by the Commissioner appointed by the Subordinate Judge of Koregaon. The learned Subordinate Judge under s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure sanctioned his prosecution under s. 179 of the Indian Penal Code and he has been convicted and applies in revision. The single ground taken in revision is that the sanction by the Subordinate Judge is incompetent and should have been by the Commissioner. The offence alleged being under s. 179, Indian Penal Code, the sanction would naturally be under s. 195, cl. (a), of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The question on the present application is whether the Commissioner before whom the alleged offence took place was or was not subordinate to the Subordinate Judge.

It is conceded that the Commissioner is a public servant under s. 21, cl. (4), of the Indian Penal Code. In the present case, the Commissioner to examine accounts was appointed under O. XXVI, rr. 11 and 12. He was appointed by the Subordinate Judge; the Subordinate Judge could have terminated his appointment at any time; his specific duties were laid down with instructions: and under O. XXVI, r. 12 cl. (2), the Subordinate Judge had power to direct further inquiry if he had reason to be dissatisfied with the proceedings and report of the Commissioner. It is difficult, in our opinion, to conceive of greater subordination than what is implied by all these acts. Appointment, exercise of power and termination of appointment were all throughout in law subject to the orders and supervision of the Subordinate Judge. Reliance was placed for the petitioner on the case of Narasimhayya v. Venkatasawmi (1). There in the judgment it was observed (page 586*): "The subordination of one public servant to another may arise either from express enactment or from the fact that both public servants belong to the same department, one being superior in rank to the other." There it was held that a Village Munsif in Madras to whom a theft was reported was not subordinate to the Sub-Magistrate. The dictum has no application to the facts of the present case. As far as we can judge of the intention of the Legislature and in the light of public policy the offence to refuse to take the oath and answer the questions put by the Commissioner appointed by the Court is an offence against the Court itself, and the Court perhaps can more appropriately consider the question of sanction rather than the Commissioner appointed by it. For the purposes of the present application, however, it is not necessary to consider this question more deeply.

We hold that the Commissioner was subordinate to the Subordinate Judge who appointed him and the sanction is, therefore, proper. The application fails and is dismissed.

Madras Motor Vehicles Rules, 1923, r. 30 (1)—License, renewal of, whether may be taken during year—"Annually"; meaning of.

The word 'annually' in r. 30 of the Madras Motor Vehicles Rules does not mean at the expiry of every twelve months but means once in a calendar year.

Where the registration certificate for running a motor bus expired on 29th March, 1926, but an application for renewal was not made till some days thereafter:

Held, that the owner was not guilty of an offence under r. 30 and that if a certificate was obtained before the end of December 1926, r. 30 would be sufficiently complied with.

Criminal appeals against the acquittal of the aforesaid accused by the Stationary

Sub-Magistrate, Karkal, in C. C. Nos. 99 and 100 of 1926 on his file respectively.

FACTS.—The accused was the Manager of Karkal Motor Service in South Kanara and was charged with having allowed his bus to run for hire after 29th March, 1926, without getting the registration certificate of the bus renewed and thereby committed a breach of r. 30 (2) of the Madras Motor Vehicles Rules punishable under s. 16 of the Indian Motor Vehicles Act VIII of 1914. The accused was granted a certificate in 1925 and it expired on the 29th March, 1926, but the application for renewal was not made till 8th April and was not received in the Collector's office till 10th April, 1926.

Rule 30 (2) runs as follows.—"Every motor vehicle which is let or plies for hire shall be registered annually." The Sub-Magistrate held on a construction of the rule and on a comparison of r. 33 of the rules relating to Heavy Motor Vehicles Rules which stated that "certificate shall continue in force for a period of not more than 12 months." That the registration certificate in this case need not be renewed exactly 12 months after its issue and that the certificate granted in 1925 did not cease to be in force after 12 months but that the rule only required that the registration certificate should be renewed every year i. e., calendar year which in the present case expired only on 31st December, 1926. The application for renewal made in April 1926 was held to be in time. The accused was accordingly held not guilty.

Mr. K. Sanjivi Kamat, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. Y. Adiga, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The accused was prosecuted for not registering annually his motor vehicle as required by r. 30 (1) of the Madras Motor Vehicles Rules, 1923. The Sub-Magistrate acquitted him holding that annually means once sometime in 1927 and so on. I am not prepared to say that this is wrong. If the time was strictly for 12 months it would have been said so (vide Form G condition 1.) Accordingly the appeal is dismissed.

PETITIONER

EMPEROR—OPPONENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 339—Wrongful restraint, what constitutes—Presence of person obstructed, whether necessary—Any direction, meaning of—Vertical direction, whether included—Offence and mere infringement of property rights, difference between.

The physical presence of the person obstructed at the moment of obstruction is not necessary for the commission of an offence under s. 339 of the Penal Code. [p. 111, col. 2.]

Section 339 of the Penal Code covers the case of obstruction to a person who reasonably wants to go in any direction, even vertically upwards if he has a right to do so. [ibid.]

But the section does not cover cases where there is no ordinary or special reason for a person to proceed in the direction which is obstructed. [p. 112, col. 1.]

During the absence of the complainant the accused constructed a tin projection hanging over the complainant's court-yard at a height of over 6 feet. The projection was such that it did not prevent anybody from moving under it but only caused obstruction to white-washing and repairs:

Held: that the accused was not guilty of an offence under s. 339, Penal Code. [ibid.]

Criminal application for revision against an order passed by the Sub Divisional Magistrate, First Class, at Broach.

Mr. J. G. Mody, for the Complainant.

JUDGMENT.

Fawcett, J.—The petitioner has been convicted of the offence of wrongful restraint under s. 341, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 15. The Magistrate found that the accused had put a tin projection over the complainant's compound-wall, so as to hang over his paved court-yard; that the projection was six feet and ten inches above the ground and was high enough for any one to move below it; but that it would be an obstruction, whenever the wall had to be white-washed or repaired. He held that the case, therefore, fell under s. 341 of the Indian Penal Code. He remarks in his judgment that this projection did not exist before the complainant went away to attend a marriage, and that on his return it was there.

Two objections have been taken to the conviction. The first is that the complainant was absent at the time the projection was put up, and so there can be no offence under s. 341, Indian Penal Code. On this point, however, I agree with the view taken in Arumuga Nadar v. Emperor (1) that there is nothing in s. 339, which requires the physical presence of the person obstructed at the moment of obstruction. The case of Emperor v. Rama Lala (2) which is relied upon is on a different point, viz., whether obstruction to a person taking his cart by a path falls within the section, when no obstruction is offered to that person passing along it without his cart.

The second objection is that the projection does not prevent the complainant from proceeding in any direction such as referred to in s. 339, and the question is whether this section covers a person proceeding in a vertical direction, as he would have to do to be obstructed by this projection.

In my opinion, the section does cover the case of a person reasonably wanting to go vertically upwards, if he has a right to do this, and being prevented from so doing by a voluntary obstruction. It would, for instance, in my opinion, cover the case of a person going up a mountain, if he has a right to get to the top and is voluntarily obstructed from so doing. The path might, in parts, be at an angle of 75 degrees; what difference does it make if the angle of progression is even 90 degrees? The only real question is, has he a right to proceed in that direction?

Again, take the case of a house owner wanting to get on to his roof and being obstructed from doing so. This would surely be covered by s. 339, just as it has been held to cover the converse case of a person wanting to get down from the roof of a house, and being obstructed by the accused's removal of a ladder: In re Telapolu Subbada (3).

Suppose that there is a procession going on the other side of a wall, and its owner wants to view it by placing a ladder or steps against the wall, and then standing on the latter, but is voluntarily obstructed in so doing; I should say the case would fall under s. 339. Even if he was absent, and the obstruction was deliberately put to prevent him doing this at the time the procession was to take place, I would still say that it is covered.

On the other hand, I think the section obviously does not cover cases, where there is no ordinary or special reason for a person to proceed in the direction which is obstructed. To hold otherwise would be to render criminal acts which do not really affect the "personal liberty of the subject" to go when and where he likes, which has been said to be the object of the protection afforded by this section: In re Saminada Pillai (4). It would, in fact, make a person, who merely infringes an easement, criminally as well as civilly liable, although such an infringement does not involve any obstruction to the natural or reasonable movements of any person. This would be to depart from the rule of strict construction of a penal law, which "requires that the language shall be so construed that no cases shall be held to fall within it which do not fall both within the reasonable meaning of its terms and within the spirit and scope of the enactment" (Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 6th Edition, page 463). The Illustration to s. 339 refers merely to the ordinary case of a path.

In the present instance, the Magistrate finds that the projection does not prevent any one moving below it, but that it is an obstruction to white-washing or repairing this wall. This, in my opinion, is not equivalent to preventing any person from proceeding, etc., within the meaning of s. 339 and the facts found do not, in my opinion, bring the case under that section.

I would, therefore, set aside the conviction and direct the fine, if paid, to be refunded.

Patkar, J.—I agree. In this case the complainant went to Navsari on May 22, 1926, and returned on the 24th. In the interval, on May 23, 1926, the accused put in a tin projection over the complainant's compound wall. The complaint was filed before the Magistrate charging the accused with the offence of wrongful restraint under s. 341, Indian Penal Code, in that by virtue of this tin projection he obstructed the free movement of the complainant and also with the offence of insulting the complainant under

s. 504, Indian Penal Code. The accused was acquitted of the offence under s. 504, but the accused was convicted under s. 341 on the ground that though the projection was high enough—six feet and ten inches—for any one to move below it, the projection would still be an obstruction when the wall would be white-washed and repaired.

It was urged on behalf of the accused that under s. 339 the obstruction was a wrong against the person and should be so complete and successful as to prevent the person obstructed from proceeding in any direction in which he has a right to proceed, and reliance was placed on the case of Emperor v. Rama Lala (2) where the accused was acquitted on the ground that though the complainant was hindered from driving his cart through the passage, he himself was unobstructed. It was also argued that as the complainant was absent, no offence under s. 341 was committed. The case of Emperor v. Rama Lala (2) was considered in a later case of Lahanu Manaji v. Emperor (5) where the accused were convicted for wrongful restraint inasmuch as they obstructed the complainant from proceeding with his bullocks in a direction in which he had a right to proceed with his bullocks. Section 339 of the Indian Penal Code is primarily intended to penalise a personal obstruction. In certain conceivable cases an offence might be committed even though the complainant may not actually be present, as for instance, in the case of Arumuga Nadar v. Emperor (1) where, during the temporary absence of the complainant, the accused put a lock to the outer door and thereby obstructed the complainant from getting into the house. But the finding in the present case is that the accused's act did not obstruct the complainant's movement as the tin projection was six feet and ten inches high. The ordinary, normal and reasonable movements of the complainant would not in any way be interfered with by this tin projection. The obstruction to the white-washing and repairing of the wall does not amount to an obstruction of the complainant to proceed in any direction in which he has a right to proceed.

I, therefore, think that the conviction should be set aside, the accused should be acquitted, and the fine, if paid, should be refunded.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 52—Partnership action—Receiver, appointment of—Execution of decree against partnership—Charging order—Priority.

It has been the recent practice of the Bombay High Court for a Chamber Judge to make a charging order whenever execution is sought against assets in the hands of a Receiver appointed by the Court in a partnership action. [p. 113, col. 1.]

The creditor who obtains such a charging action is entitled to rank in priority to all other creditors who have not obtained charging orders or who are not otherwise attaching creditors. [p. 117, col. 1.]

Kewney v. Attrill (1), Shidlingappa v. Shankarappa (2), Haji Ismail & Co. v. Rabiabai (3) and Visvanadhan Chetti v. Arunachalam Chetti (4), discussed.

Mr. Mulla, in support of the summons.

Mr. Pandia, for the Defendant, in Suit No. 3163 of 1920.

Mr. B. J. Desai, for Bilasra, to show cause.

JUDGMENT.—This is a summons taken out by the plaintiff in Suit No. 3163 of 1920 for directions, as to whether the plaintiff in Suit No. 1664 of 1918 is entitled to priority over the other creditors of the firm of Messrs. Karsondas Damodar & Co., by reason of the charging order dated October 7, 1925, and for costs.

I made the charging order on October 7, 1925, as Chamber Judge following a long-standing practice of this Court whereby such charging orders are made whenever execution is sought against assets in the hands of a Receiver appointed by the Court. The practice was started by Macleod, J., as Chamber Judge, and has been followed by succeeding Chamber Judges. The older practice of issuing in such cases a notice to the officer concerned in the manner provided by O. XXI, r. 52, was abrogated and the party seeking execution was required instead to obtain a charging order from the Judge. The practice of this Court in such cases has, since the institution of these charging orders, been to order pro rata distribution of the net assets in the hands of the Receiver among all the creditors of the partnership notwithstanding the charging orders so granted.

Our charging orders are taken from the one formulated by Kay, J., in Kewney v. Attrill (1). In that case after judgment had been pronounced in a Chancery action for dissolution of a partnership, and a Receiver had been appointed, a creditor obtained judgment in the Queen's Bench Division against the firm for the amount of his debt and costs. He applied in the Chancery action for leave to execute his decree against the assets in the hands of the Receiver. Kay, J., made an order giving the judgment creditor a charge for his debt and costs on all the partnership monies come or coming to the Receiver; he, the creditor, undertaking to deal with the charge according to the order of the Court. In making the charging order Kay, J., made his intention clear as follows (page 346*) :—

"...If there is a bankruptcy the trustee in bankruptcy will take subject to prior equities and, therefore, subject to a charge. I give the applicants, the judgment creditors, a charge now on the moneys which are in the hands of or may be taken possession of by the Receiver, and they must undertake to deal with the charge according to the order of the Court. The charge will be for the judgment debt and costs and interest at four per cent., and the costs in Chambers and here. The intention of the Court is to preserve to the applicants all the rights which they would have had if they had issued execution and the Sheriff had seized and sold the assets to day."

It is clear from the judgment of Kay, J., that it was not his intention to deprive the execution creditor of the benefit of his execution owing to the accident that the assets against which execution was sought to be levied were in the hands of an officer of the Court. By his charging order he effectively preserved to the execution creditor the benefit to which he would in law be entitled but postponed the payment until further orders. In the course of arguments from the Bar Kay, J., however, is reported to have made the following remark (page 346*) :—

"By the appointment of a Receiver the Court aims at equality amongst the creditors. If I give you leave it must be on your undertaking to hold the proceeds and deal with them in accordance with any order the Court may make."

Those remarks form no part of the judgment of Kay, J., and the judgment makes it clear that it was not the intention of Kay, J., by the charging order to deprive the execution creditor of any fruit of his execution. The form of the charging order adopted in English practice is set out in Seton on Judgments and Orders, 7th Edition, Vol. I, page 471, as follows:—

"Upon motion &c., by Counsel for A. B., and upon hearing Counsel for the plaintiff and the defendant. This Court doth declare that the said A. B. is entitled to a charge for the amount of his judgment debt, interest, and costs recovered against the defendant by judgment dated &c., in an action in the K. B. Div. of C. v. D., and for costs of the said order dated &c., and of this application to be taxed &c., upon the assets which now are in or hereafter come to the hands of the Receiver in this action, the said A. B. by his Counsel submitting that such charge shall be dealt with in such manner as the Judge shall direct, the intention of this Court being to preserve to the said A. B. such legal rights as he would have had if the sheriff had seized under the execution and sold on this day."

In Shidlingappa v. Shankarappa (2) our Appeal Court has referred to and commented on Kewney v. Attrill (1). In the case before the Appeal Court the plaintiff and defendants traded in partnership and in a suit for dissolution of partnership a decree was passed appointing a Receiver with the usual directions for accounts and enquiry. In the meanwhile, a creditor of the partnership had sued the plaintiff and the defendants for the debt due to him, but the Court had passed a decree against the plaintiff alone, leaving his rights against the defendants to be settled in the accounts under the decree dissolving the partnership and appointing the Receiver. The plaintiff had satisfied the decree and had instituted a suit to recover from the defendants their share of the decretal debt. The Subordinate Judge had awarded the plaintiff's claim. The Appeal Court upheld the Subordinate Judge's judgment to the extent that the plaintiff was entitled to call upon the defendants to meet their share of the liability which had been discharged. The Appeal Court, however, proceeded to discuss the ratio decidendi in Kewney v. Attrill (1). Chandavarkar, J., remarks as follows (page 179*):—

"As between the parties to the present suit; however, there has been already a decree dissolving the partnership, ordering accounts to be taken and the debts of the partnership to be paid. The mutual rights and liabilities of the parties to this action for contribution must, therefore, be decided with reference to that decree. By it not only was the partnership declared dissolved and accounts directed to be taken, but a Receiver was appointed to recover outstandings, pay debts, and do all that might be necessary. By the appointment of a Receiver the Court must be taken to have aimed at equality amongst the creditors. It was open, of course, to any creditor of the partnership to sue the partners and obtain a decree for the recovery of his debt; but no creditor, after the appointment of a Receiver, could execute any decree, obtained after that appointment, to the prejudice of other creditors of the partnership. To obtain satisfaction of it he was bound to go to the Court which had appointed the Receiver and take its directions. That was recognized as the law in such cases in Kewney v. Attrill (1)."

The above remarks of the Appeal Court appear to me to be obiter dicta. With great respect I am unable to agree with this statement of the effect of Kewney v. Attrill (1). There is no reason adduced why in the case of the dissolution of a partnership the judgment-creditors of the partnership seeking execution should be put on a level of equality with all other creditors of the partnership, both ascertained and unascertained. There is no analogy in the case of a partnership with that of the insolvency of an individual or the winding up of a limited liability Company. The creditors of a partnership have their remedy not only against the partnership assets, but against the private property of the partners. Where an individual is adjudicated bankrupt or a company has gone into liquidation it may be equitable to hold that as the Court is administering the affairs of the bankrupt or of the Company by means of its Official Assignee or the liquidator as the case may be that all creditors, whether judgment-creditors or ordinary creditors, should rank equally. Indeed the Insolvency Act and the Companies' Act provide that on adjudication of a person or liquidation of a company all executions then pending against the property of the insolvent or the assets of the Company cease. In the case of an administration suit the suit is primarily for the benefit of the creditors of the deceased, and where the assets are in the hands of the Court through its Receiver, equity requires that all creditors should rank equally and there should be no scramble among them for priority as the liability of the legal representative is to the extent of the estate only. But in the case of a partnership, the liability of the partners is unlimited. I am unable to appreciate why the Court should aim at equality among the creditors of a partnership firm. A suit for the dissolution of a partnership cannot be said to be for the benefit of the creditors; it is primarily for the benefit of the partners themselves. If the debts of the partnership are to be ascertained by the Court that is because the rights of the partners inter se in respect of the assets cannot be determined until such debts are ascertained and provided for. Ordinarily there is no reference to the Commissioner in a partnership suit requiring him to pay off the debts of the partnership or to invite creditors' claims. In an administration suit the Commissioner has to invite creditors' claims which on being proved may be paid off from the assets in the hands of the Court.

In Haji Ismail & Co. v. Rabiabai (3) an attorney claimed a lien for his costs against certain partnership assets. The plaintiffs had obtained a decree against the defendants and were granted leave to levy execution against the assets of the partnership in the hands of the Receiver. They took out a garnishee notice against the Receiver to pay the monies to the plaintiffs. Macleod, J., held that the moneys in the hands of the Receiver were subject to the lien of the Solicitor in the partnership suit for his costs. With regard to the procedure adopted in execution, however, he remarked as follows (page 485*) :—

"...the procedure adopted by the plaintiffs in this suit is, in my opinion, wrong.

They should not have issued execution against the assets in the hands of the Receiver. The proper course was to ask the Court for a charging order in the form granted by Kay, J., in Kewney v. Attrill (1). The assets of the partnership can then be dealt with by the Court by giving directions to the Receiver and it is desirable that this procedure should be followed in future."

By this judgment Macleod, J., instituted the practice of charging orders on assets in the hands of Receivers. There is nothing in Macleod, J.'s judgment, however, to warrant the conclusion that by giving the charging order the Court aims at equality among the creditors irrespective of their rights as attaching creditors.

Pratt, J., had a similar point before him which he has dealt with in an unreported judgment in Kakubhai Bhimji v. Hargovan Kanji, O. C. J. Suit No. 1934 of 1919, decided on December 23, 1920. The applicant before the learned Judge had obtained a decree against the partnership firm. He obtained a Judge's order giving him leave to attach in execution of his decree the moneys of the partnership in the hands of the Receiver. The applicant thereafter applied to the Judge for an order on the Receiver to pay to him the amount of his decree. The learned Judge held that the procedure adopted by the applicant was altogether wrong and misconceived. He should not have issued execution against the assets in the hands of the Receiver, but should have applied for a charging order in the form granted in Kewney v. Attrill (1). The learned Judge proceeds : "The effect of the judgment in that case is well stated by Chandavarkar, J., in Shidlingappa v. Shankarappa (2)," and cites with approval the passage from the judgment of Chandavarkar, J., which I have above set out and from which I respectfully dissent. The learned Judge further proceeds :—

"The procedure adopted by the plaintiff in this case was condemned by the present Chief Justice in Haji Ismail & Co. v. Rabiabi (3). His Lordship in that judgment said it was desirable that the procedure laid down in Kewney v. Attrill (1) should be followed in future. But unfortunately, it does not appear that much attention has been paid to that direction. It should be clearly understood that the appointment of a Receiver of partnership assets operates as an injunction not only to partners, but also to creditors: and that no creditor is entitled to payment except under the directions of the Court and the Court will not direct payment until all the assets have been realised. A creditor who has obtained a decree may obtain priority by obtaining the 'charging order' in the form prescribed in Kewney v. Attrill (1). But even that order is given on an undertaking to deal with the charge according to the orders of the Court."

Pratt, J., recognized in his judgment that by obtaining a charging order the creditor would prima facie obtain priority, but that priority would be subject to the further orders of the Court.

With great respect, I am of opinion that there was no need for our Courts to complicate the procedure in execution by inventing a form of charging order for which there is no warrant under the Code of Civil Procedure. Order XXI, r. 52, of the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to such cases. It provides:—

"Where the property to be attached is in the custody of any Court or public officer, the attachment shall be made by a notice to such Court or officer, requesting that such property, and any interest or dividend becoming payable thereon, may be held subject to the further orders of the Court from which the notice is issued:

"Provided that, where such property is in the custody of a Court, any question of title or priority arising between the decree-holder and any other person, not being the judgment-debtor, claiming to be interested in such property by virtue of any assignment, attachment or otherwise, shall be determined by such Court."

The provisions of O. XXI, r. 52, appear to me to be wide enough to protect the Receiver as well as the interests of which he is the custodian.

Order XXI, r. 52, has now been construed in the recent Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Visvanadhan Chetty v. Arunachalam Chetti (4). That case decides that:—

"Where the property attached is in the custody of a Court it is the duty of such Court to hold it at the disposal of the attaching Court and it is the duty of the attaching Court, if the property attached is money, to call upon the custody Court to pay it into the attaching Court and in other cases, to provide for the realization of the property, and to divide the money or proceeds rateably between the attaching decree-holder and the other decree-holders who are entitled to distribution under s. 73, Civil Procedure Code, viz., those who have applied to it for execution before the receipt of such assets.

"Where the property in the custody Court is the subject of several attachments in execution of several decrees the custody Court must award priority to the first in point of time. If the other decree-holders want to share in the rateable distribution they must apply in time to the first attaching Court. The power conferred on the custody Court by the proviso to O. XXI, r. 52, Civil Procedure Code to determine claims to priority, etc., does not entitle the custody Court itself to distribute the assets rateably among the attaching decree-holders...

"Where the attaching Court and the custody Court are the same, there is a receipt of assets within the meaning of s. 73, Civil Procedure Code, only when so much of the money standing to the credit of the judgment-debtor as is necessary to satisfy the decree-holders who have applied to it for execution, is ordered to be transferred to the credit of the first attaching creditor's suit."

It has been urged on behalf of the applicants that the charging order obtained by the plaintiff in Suit No. 1664 of 1918 is irregular, inasmuch as the assets being in the custody of a Receiver he should have obtained leave to proceed against that officer in the suit in which he was appointed Receiver. The irregularity, if at all, is due to the confusion which has resulted in the office by the adoption of the form of charging order to which I have referred. It appears to have been the intention of the plaintiff in Suit No. 1664 of 1918 by his application for execution to apply for leave to execute against the Receiver. If owing to a misunderstanding of the situation created by the practice of this office, the plaintiff in Suit No. 1664 of 1918 has been misled, it is open to the Court to rectify the error at any moment by granting him the leave required. In my opinion he is entitled to receive the balance of his decretal amount subject to the Receiver's costs, charges and expenses and further subject to the Solicitors' lien for the costs of the partnership action in the partnership suit

(4) 60 Ind. Cas. 302; 44 M. 100; 39 M. L. J. 608; 12 L. W. 744; 28 M. L. T. 412; (1921) M. W. N. 14 (F. B.).

His claim should be satisfied before any further distribution of the assets takes place among those who are not attaching creditors.

I direct, therefore, that subject to the costs, charges and expenses of the Receiver and of the Solicitors' costs in the partnership action the Receiver do pay over to the plaintiff in Suit No. 1664 of 1918 the balance of the decretal amount and he will rank in priority to all other creditors who have not obtained charging orders or who are not otherwise attaching creditors. The costs of the summons will be tacked on to his claim. The plaintiffs in Suit No. 3163 of 1920 to get their costs of this summons out of the assets in the hands of the Receiver; the defendant Kaku Vallabhdas to get his costs out of the partnership assets after the claims of all creditors are satisfied.

The word 'chhayahrad' in a patni lease does not mean any right to underground minerals. The word 'sayer' means all sorts of imports in addition to land revenue but does not include minerals. [p. 119, col. 2.]

The expression 'darabast hakuk' in a patni lease is a familiar expression intended to throw a net so as to include every thing which might be considered as belonging to the zemindari right. [p. 120, col. 2.]

The period of adverse possession of a quarry cannot be counted from the time when different sorts of minerals are found at different depths of the quarry. [p. 121, col. 2; p. 122, col. 1.]

The rule that a stranger cannot ordinarily acquire title to the whole of a mine by working a part of it and only acquires possession of the minerals which he actually digs does not apply where the stranger works the mine in such a manner as to prove possession of the whole of it. [p. 122, col. 1.]

Where the law requires a conveyance for the purpose of transfer of title this cannot be done by a mere agreement. An agreement by a person giving up his right to a property and acknowledging another's right of primogeniture cannot, therefore, convey his title to the latter. [p. 123, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

B. B. Ghose, J.—These two appeals arise out of one suit brought by the plaintiff Rajah Bhupendra Narain Sinha Bahadur for declaration of his right to a certain hillock within his estate as shebait of idol Parbutty Mata, and in the alternative for a declaration, by virtue of his right as zemindar of the estate, that the principal defendants have no right to take away earth and stones and minerals from the hillock in the exercise of the right that the defendants have as darpatnidars under the patnis within his estate. The plaintiff is one of the four sons of Maharaja Ranjit Sinha. The other sons and grandsons by those sons are defendants Nos. 16 to 20 in the case. The patni was created of three mahals within the estate No. 1152/1 by a predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiff's father. The patni was granted to two persons in equal shares by deeds, dated the 30th May, 1861. The three mouzhals of which the patni was granted was called Taraf Nalhati, Hat Nalhati and Kalindipur.

Out of these three mouzahs the patnidars granted darpatni of Taraf Nalhathi and Hat Nalhathi by separate leases to one Ganga Prosad Saha in 1862. The defendants Nos. 1 to 9 came into the possession of the darpatni interest through various mesne purchases by their deed, dated 11th October, 1898. The defendant No. 9 died during the pendency of the suit and is represented by his sons defendants 9 ka, 9 kha, 9 ga, 9 gha and grandson 11 ka. The defendants Nos. 10 and 11 were lessees under the darpatnidars of the portion of the property now in suit. The plaintiff's claim with regard to ownership on the ground that the hillock is the property of the idol Parbati Mata has been found against him in the Court below, and no question has been raised before us about that right of the plaintiff; so we have to consider only the question as regards the plaintiff's right as zemindar. The plaintiff claims the zemindari right in himself on the ground that by custom of primogeniture prevailing in his family he is entitled to the entire estate to the exclusion of his brothers and their descendants. He also relies upon an ekrar said to have been executed in his favour by his adult brothers and his mother acting as guardian for his infant brother with regard to his sole right to succeed to the estate left by his father. The defendants disputed the title of the plaintiff on the ground of primogeniture to the entire property. They further alleged that they were entitled to take away stones and earth and minerals within their darpatni by virtue of the right granted to the patnidar under the patni settlement, and they also pleaded limitation. The Subordinate Judge found in favour of the plaintiff with regard to the question of title to the minerals and gave a decree to this effect that the plaintiff's title to the minerals lying in the hill by virtue of his being the zemindar be declared and a perpetual injunction be issued restraining the principal defendants from raising the said minerals by digging and from appropriating the same, but it is ordered that the defendants will be competent to dig and take such stones and gravel as are found on the surface of the hills. The Subordinate Judge found against the plaintiff on the question of primogeniture and he held that the plaintiff was entitled to only 1/4th of the property and gave him a decree for a fourth of the sum which he found the defendants are liable to pay on account of damages for the quantity of earth or minerals taken away by them. The principal defendants Nos. 1 to 11 appeal to this Court with regard to that portion of the decree which is against them, namely, the injunction granted against the defendants from raising minerals and the amount of damages allowed to the plaintiff. Their appeal is No. 70 of 1924. The plaintiff appeals against that part of the decree which dismissed a portion of his claim. His appeal is No. 123 of 1924.

Appeal No. 70 is the principal appeal and it should be taken up first. The first ground that was taken in the appeal was as to the question of the title of the plaintiff. This question was raised clearly under a misapprehension. It was urged that the zemindari under which the patnis were created belonged to the idol Ramchandra Jiu and it was Touzie No. 1152/2. This argument as was pointed out by the learned Advocate for the respondent was based upon a misconception of the evidence of plaintiff's am-mukhtar and Pleader printed at page 63, Part I of the paper-book. At line about 25 the figure 1152/2 ought to have been 1152/1 and this is also clear from the fact that the kobala by which the defendants acquired the darpatni mentioned the patni to be within Estate 1152/1. Further it appears that in the lower Court the title of the plaintiff as zemindar was not disputed as will be found from the observation of the Subordinate Judge on issue No. 17. In reply, however, on behalf of the appellants a futile attempt was made to sustain the plea that it was debutter property, but such a plea could not be allowed to be heard in the circumstances stated above.

The principal points raised are really three, that under the terms of the patni lease the patnidars were expressly granted all minerals and underground rights; secondly, even if there was no express grant of underground rights, in the absence of any reservation, the grant of patni conveys all rights including underground rights which belonged to the zemindar; and thirdly, the plaintiff's right is barred by limitation. The fourth ground is that the amount of damages is excessive. Another ground was taken but was not elaborated that the substance taken out by the defendants was not mineral but mere earth. It was further argued that the defendants had not worked underground but their working had not gone below the level ground and as patnidars they are entitled to remove any maunds of earth within the patni and they cannot be charged with having worked any mines.

I propose to take up the question with reference to the construction of the grant of patni first. There are three documents on the record relating to the patni grant, one pattah and two kabuliyats executed by the two patnidars. They are all in the same terms and one of them was taken by both sides for the purpose of their argument. This was the document which is marked Ex. 42, the kabuliyat executed by one of the patnidars Uma Sundari Dassya in favour of Rani Lachmi Kumari Saheba the ancestress of the plaintiff. The official translation of the document with regard to certain parts was questioned by both sides and I have taken the translation which has been agreed to by both sides except with regard to one expression which I shall put down in the original. This document Ex. 42 after stating under what right the lessee wanted to take the property, on payment of a premium of Rs. 3,655 and after stating that the zemindar was willing to grant a patni of the mahals in question excluding establishment charges and expenses in connection with deities, bund, pulbundi and wages and so forth, and after mentioning other things excluded proceeds thus:—"I shall enjoy down to my sons and grandsons, etc., in succession in great bliss the mahals within the four boundaries without any deduction, the chhayahrad (shades and lakes), land and water, whatever has been produced and all seeds of production, mal and sayers, barring those sayers prohibited by Government, all sorts of land held without payment of rent but which are liable to be assessed, hasil and patit, nalkar, bankar, falkar and jalkar and bils, jhils and all tanks, gardens, trees whether fruit bearing or non-fruit-bearing and with the exception of debutter and brahmattar and mahatran, piran, etc.....which have been confirmed under the orders of Government, and except the aforesaid gifted brahmattars, etc., all rights and interests (darabast hakuk) I shall possess in patni taluk in the mofussil.....I shall never make any application to any Government official for kharij (mutation of my name)." Towards the end of the pattah after making certain other recitals there is the provision that the grantee will not be entitled to cut down those trees the cutting of which will cause damage to the mahal or loss to the jama. There is a further provision that the zemindar would get the money which will be due from the Government on account of land acquisition for cart-roads and Railways and cacha roads, as well as any kind of road that may be made in future.

The first contention on behalf of the appellants is that the expression chhayahrad means sky and underground. Chhaya literally means shadow, but in the dictionary it is found that it may also mean sun from which it is contended that it is sky. Hrad means a deep piece of water naturally formed, or in other words a lake. But nowhere it can be found that it means something underground. This expression chhayahrad in the pattah or kabuliyat is unmeaning, and I confess it is new to me. In the course of my experience I have seen a large number of these pattahs and kabuliyats but I have never met with this expression. I cannot hold that this expression distinctly means any right to underground minerals.

The next contention is that the word sayer includes the minerals, because it is stated that sayer means all income which is not derived from land revenue. I am unable to accept that contention, because my impression is that sayer means all sorts of imports in addition to land revenue.

Lastly, it is contended that all the expressions taken together along with the expression darabast hakuk conveys the entire interest of the zemindar in the mahals in question to the patnidar and nothing was reserved. In my judgment that is the proper construction which may be given to those words used. The only doubt that has been cast upon this construction is on account of the observation made in the judgment of Lord Shaw in the case of Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (1), where it has been observed that the words mai hak kakuk only refer to the rights that were granted previously and not to all the rights of the grantor. However that may be, the contention of the learned Advocate is that when mahals are granted in patni taluk without any deduction, of everything that can be mentioned within the four boundaries, all rights of the zemindar have been conveyed, and, in my opinion, there is considerable force in this contention. It is argued on behalf of the respondent on this question that when there are reservations as regards the cutting of trees and compensation money that would be obtained for land acquisition for public purposes, it should be held that all rights of the zemindar were not conveyed by the grant. In my opinion that argument is of very little substance. It seems to me that after giving all the rights to the patnidar there was a small reservation about cutting down trees which would cause damage to the mahal or loss to the jama so as to affect the right of the patnidar to the rent reserved. With regard to the compensation money the same observation may be made. In the absence of the stipulation about compensation money it would have been divided between the zemindar and the patnidar under the law. By special contract the zemindar provides that the entire amount should be taken by himself. That does not take away from the rights of the patnidar anything more than what was reserved under the grant. It seems to me that the special mention of these reservations shows that nothing else was reserved. I need only add that minerals were not reserved.

The next question is whether by the grant of a patni taluk underground rights have been conveyed. I will rest content by referring to the observations of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Satya Niranjan Chakravarti v. Ram Lal Kaviraj (2). Their Lordships did not agree with the dictum of the Patna High Court that the judgment of Prinsep and Hill, JJ., in Ali Quader Syed Hossein Aly v. Jogendra Narain Roy (3) has been overruled by the decisions of the Privy Council cited in the judgment. It follows, therefore, that that case decided by the learned Judges of this Court is still good law so far as we are concerned; unless we are prepared to differ from it and refer the question decided there to a Full Bench, we are bound to follow it. We are not prepared to differ from what was laid down in that case. So we are bound to follow the law laid down in it. The learned Advocate for the respondent endeavoured to distinguish that case from the present on the ground that the words there used in the patni pattah were "darabast zemindari hakuk," while the words in the present grant are only "darabast hakuk." I do not think that there is any difference in substance, because the word "darabast" means "all," "entire" and "hakuk" is the plural of "hak" which means "right," and when the zemindar grants "darabast hakuk" he grants "darabast hakuk" of his zemindari right. It was next contended that the terms "darabast hakuk" were intended to refer only to those rights which had been previously described, rights generally known as ejusdem generis. This argument was advanced in the case of Ali Quader Syed Hossein Aly v. Jogendra Narain Roy (3) cited above, and the learned Judges observed that this expression was intended, to use a familiar expression, to throw a net so as to include everything which might be considered as belonging to the zemindari right. With those observations I respectfully agree.

It was next contended by the learned Advocate for the respondent that there is really no essential difference between a mokarrari and a patni taluk and he referred to the case of Sonet Kooer v. Himmatt Bahadoor (4) and his contention was that it is open to us to decide notwithstanding the observation of Lord Dunedin in the case of Satya Niranjan Chakravarti v. Ram Lal Kaviraj (2) cited above, that a mokarrari and a patni are similar in all respects. It is unnecessary for me to hazard the opinion that a mokarraridar should have the same interest as a patnidar. Although there are various points of similarity between a mokarrari and a patni there are evidently many points of difference, and I think it is necessary for me to point out the essential characteristics of a patni which may not belong to a mokarrari. First, I would refer to s. 3 of Regulation VIII of 1819. In cl. (1) of that section it is mentioned that the interest of the patnidar was capable of being transferred by sale, etc., in the same manner as other "real property." It is contended by the learned Advocate for the appellants that in 1819 this Regulation being drafted by English lawyers the expression real property has a particular significance, because a leasehold was not considered real property in English Law. So a patni although in form a lease was not a mere leasehold property. There appears to be some substance in that contention. In the second clause power is given to the patnidar of letting out the lands composing their taluks in any manner that may be deemed conducive to their interest. That also is a matter which should be borne in mind. In s. 11, cl. (1) the defaulting patnidar is described as the 'defaulting proprietor,' and in the second paragraph of the first clause it is stated that the rent receivable by the zemindar is in fact his reserved property in the tenure. In the second clause of s. 11 again the defaulting patnidar is described as the late proprietor. I may refer also to Field's Introduction to the Regulations which is a well known authority with regard to land tenures. The learned author observes with reference to such taluks and subordinate taluks in s. 36 of his Introduction:—"Considerable sums are paid by way of fine on the creation of both the parent and subordinate taluks. Men who do not like to part with the status, of zemindar by an absolute sale of the zemindari will readily enough raise money by allowing the proprietary right to be carved up into estates of minor value, the whole substance going into the hands of others, while the name alone remains to them." Again in the case of Gyaram Mondal v. Gyaram Naik (5), it was held that by the patni deed every right that the zeminder had passed to the patnidar and that unless there is some limitation expressly mentioned the patnidar can without let and hindrance exercise those rights. The observations of the Privy Council in the case of Joykissen Mookerjee v. Collector of East Burdwan (6) as well as in Ranjit Singh Bahadur v. Kali Dasi Debi (7) are to the same effect. In Tarinee Churn Gangooly v. Watson & Co. (8), Mr. Justice Markby in delivering the judgment of the Court observed with reference to a patni interest—"Though, of course, we do not mean to deny that it is a tenure, yet the relation between the zemindar and talukdar has scarcely any analogy to the ordinary one of landlord and tenant. The zemindar parts with all control over his property, and all interest in it except to an annual rent which has been likened to what in England is called quit-rent." Lastly, I may cite the observations of Mr. Justice Chakravarty, who has considerable experience with reference to land tenures, in the case of Surendra Narain Sinha v. Bejoya Singh Dudhuria (9) to the effect that patni taluks were really transfer of the zemindari interest, the consideration being payable not in a lump sum but by annual payment in the shape of rent; and lower down, he observes these patni taluks are really grants of the zemindar's interest without restriction unless specially mentioned in the pattah. I need hardly add that I quite agree with the observations made above as regards the nature of a patni taluk.

On these grounds, in my opinion, the patnidar and the defendants as darpatnidars being grantees from the patnidar are entitled to all the minerals included within the patni grant.

The next question of importance is the question of limitation. This hillock as it appears from the plaintiff's evidence is about half a mile in length and a quarter of a mile wide. The height is about 40 feet and the diggings are from 10 to 30 feet and the quarries were down to the level ground. It also appears from the evidence that there are about 300 to 400 pits in all parts of the hillock. The Subordinate Judge has found that the defendants have been working the quarries for stones and earth for about 60 years and it also appears that a Railway siding was taken to the hillock for the purpose of carrying stones and gravel. There is no question that the defendants have been making quarries quite openly and there is no question of surreptitious possession. The Subordinate Judge, however, decides in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the yellow earth or ochre which is now being taken and found to be of some value was found in large quantities only about six years before suit and, therefore, the plaintiff's right is not barred by limitation. I do not think that the period of adverse possession of the quarries on the hillock may be counted from the time when different sorts of earth were found at different depths of the quarry. In my opinion adverse possession should be considered to have commenced when the defendants began to make quarries on the side of the hillock. I am aware that it has been held that a stranger cannot ordinarily acquire title to the whole of a mine by working a part of it and he only acquires possession of the minerals which he actually digs. But the question may be different where a stranger works a mine in such a manner as to prove possession to the whole of it. See the observations of Hall, V. C., in Ashton v. Stock (10). As I have already said, here the defendants worked the quarries in all parts of the hillock openly and not underground. It is hardly necessary to say anything further than to rely upon the observations of the Privy Council in the case of Satya Niranjan Chakravarti v. Ram Lal Kaviraj (2). Their Lordships say:—"The working by the defendants was, therefore, working not under a lease but by a mere trespasser. If, therefore, the suit is possessory then it is barred under Art. 144, for more than 12 years have elapsed since the possession became adverse. If, on the other hand, the suit is declaratory, it is barred under Art. 120, for more than six years have elapsed since the right to sue the declaration emerged." The question of limitation, therefore, must also be decided against the plaintiff.

There is the question whether the article taken out is mineral or not. The appellants rely upon the contradictions in the evidence of the two expert witnesses examined by the plaintiff. One is Monmotho Kumar Roy who says that the earth that is mineral contains sodi carbonate and sodium sulphate, and his witness G. N. Fruthin gives in his evidence an analysis of the thing taken away but does not mention that there is either sodi carbonate or sodium sulphate. I do not think much depends on this question. It may be a mineral or some valuable earth underground. If nothing underground was given to the defendants by the patni the plaintiff would be entitled to it. If everything passed to the patnidar then the plaintiff would not be entitled to it.

It is unnecessary to discuss another small point which was urged by the appellants and it is this, that the earth itself has no commercial value but is used for the purpose of adulteration of real yellow ochre. There is evidence on the part of the plaintiff that the earth that is taken from there can be sold in the market and there is evidence on the plaintiff's side about its sale in the locality. If it had really no market value no body would ever endeavour to raise a quarrel about it. Lastly, with regard to the question of damages it was argued on behalf of the appellants that damages have been calculated at a very excessive rate. The defendants, however, have not given any evidence on the basis of which the amount can be reduced. From the evidence on the record the Subordinate Judge has made a calculation and I do not think there is any reason to differ from it.

As, however, the plaintiff's case fails on the other grounds I have already stated this appeal must be allowed and the suit dismissed with costs in both Courts.

It was pointed out on behalf of defendant No. 11 ka that he obtained the interest of defendant No. 9 in the property in question by a deed of gift, dated 19th November, 1919. So, if the defendants are liable for any damages this defendant would be liable along with the other heirs of defendant No. 9 for damages up to 18th November, 1919, and defendant No. 11 ka would only be liable for damages payable by defendant No. 9 from the 19th November, 1919. This circumstance should be noted.

The appeal of the plaintiff that is Appeal No. 123, relates to the matter of damages and incidentally the question of primogeniture arises. It is urged on behalf of the plaintiff that the Subordinate Judge has refused to give the plaintiff the entire amount of the damages on insufficient grounds. The plaintiff, however, has not been able to show that there was any custom of primogeniture in his family. On the other hand, there is evidence of a plaint in a suit brought by the plaintiff's father in 1895, Ex. U, where it was stated by him that his father Raja Kirti Chandra Bahadur got the entire interest in the property under the Will executed by his brother Kumar Uday Chand. This statement strikes at the foundation of the claim of right on the basis of primogeniture by custom. The learned Advocate then refers to the agreement, I have already stated, (Ex. 43, dated the 18th June, 1918,) entered into between the plaintiff and his brothers Nripendra Narain, Rajendra Narain and Kumar Birendra Narain, minor represented by his mother and next friend Moharani Kamal Kumari Saheba in which the right of primogeniture was acknowledged and the other three brothers gave up their rights to the property. Assuming that the minor's interest can be legally given up by such an agreement the right of these persons to the property could not be taken to have been transferred by an agreement like this. The law requires a conveyance for the purpose of transfer of title and this cannot be made by a mere agreement, see Jadu Nath Poddar v. Rup Lal Poddar (11).

This is the only ground that was urged in this appeal. This appeal must be dismissed with costs apart from the questions which have been found against the plaintiff's contention in the other appeal.

The costs are to be recovered in both the appeals by the defendants-appellants in Appeal No. 70, one set in each appeal.

Roy, J.—These appeals arise out of a suit brought by the plaintiff zemindar to establish his right to minerals in a small hill within Mouzah Nalhati. The Subordinate Judge decreed the suit in part. The darpatnidars who resisted the suit are appellants here. The plaintiff has a separate appeal in respect of his title. It appears that the darpatnidars have quarried stones on the surface of the hill without objection or opposition for many years. Recently ochre has been found below the surface and it has turned out to be of value in the market. A question was raised that the substance was not mineral and that the defendants were not really going below the surface. It has been found by experts that the substance found is a mineral and since pits have been dug up to a depth of 30 feet it may be taken that the dispute is in respect of the sub-soil, i. e., of mineral rights in the sub-soil.

The substantial question in dispute is whether or not a patni lease, as such, conveys minerals to the patnidar. Our task in this discussion is easy. The question was decided in favour of the patnidar by Prinsep and Hill, JJ., in the case of Alli Quader Syed Hossein Aly v. Jogendra Narain Roy (3). It was held here and in the Behar High Court that the authority in favour of the patnidar has been overruled by the decisions of the Judicial Committee in a series of cases. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee have now in the case of Satya Naranjan Chakravarti v. Ram Lal Kaviraj (2) pronounced that the judgment of Prinsep and Hill, JJ., has not been overruled, and that the question whether a patni lease, as such, conveys the minerals to the patnidar is, so far as the Judicial Committee is concerned, still open. Their Lordships go on to say that "the question turns on what is, the true nature of a patni tenure." So far as we are concerned, therefore, the judgment of Prinsep and Hill, JJ., still rules the field. We are bound by that decision.

It would appear, therefore, that the principle that minerals will not be held to have formed part of a grant unless there was an express grant, applies to the cases of mokarrari lease, maintenance grant, talabi brahmattar and grants of that kind. Dr. Basak contended that the nature of a patni tenure is in no way different from the mokarrari grant discussed in the case of Girdhari Singh v. Megh Lal Pandey (1) and he invites us to refer this case to a Full Bench. We are unable to do this for the reason that we do think that a patni tenure is different in many respects from a lease-hold interest.

The difference will be apparent from a brief historical survey of taluks in Bengal. The word 'taluka' is derived from the Arabic word alak which signifies 'to hang from,' 'to depend upon'; alak also means a leech which hangs from the body to which it has attached itself and as another quality said to have belonged to the talukdar and means connection and dependence. In Upper India the taluk was dependent upon and subordinate to the Sovereign. In Bengal the taluk was subordinate to the zemindar but not always. The larger talukdars were huzuri, i. e., they were immediately under the supreme Government to which they paid their revenue direct; while the smaller ones were mazkuri or specified, i. e., in the sanad of the zemindar through whom they paid their revenue. Doubtless all were originally huzuri but when the revenue came to be collected through the zemindars, the small talukdars were directed to pay their revenue through this channel in order to avoid the inconvenience of a multiplicity of small payments into the khalsa or trea-surey." (Field's Introduction to the Regulations, page 30 notes). I mention this to show that the talukdar was in status equal to the zemindar. Regulation VIII of 1793, s. 51 recognised the dependent taluks created by the zemindars before the Permanent Settlement and protection was given to them subject to the payment of the fixed rent. A number of the talukdars was given the option of getting separated and holding directly under the Government as owners of separate estates. At the same time Government declared by Regulation XLIV of 1793 that no zemindar shall grant pattahs to raiyyat or other persons for cultivation of lands for a term exceeding 10 years. The zemindars, however, continued to grant leases in violation of the prohibition. Regulation V of 1812 removed the restriction of 10 years but no provision was made for validating the leases granted in violation of the prohibition. Regulation VIII of 1819, i. e., the Patni Regulation remedied the omission. The preamble to the Regulation recites the circumstances and s. 2 validates these leases.

What happened was that the zemindar of Burdwan was threatened with ruin on account of the high land revenue assessed on the estates settled with him at the Permanent Settlement, and large tracts were let out by him in perpetuity and at fixed rent. Thus were created permanent tenures known as patni taluks and the object was easy and punctual realisation of rent to enable the zemindar to pay the revenue to the Government. By 1819 it was found that permanent alienations of this kind had been extensively effected in other zemindaris in the neighbouring districts and these alienations were formally legalised by Regulation VIII of 1819. By the Permanent Settlement, Government gave up its position as the exclusive owner of the soil and contented itself with a permanent rent charge on the land, thus escaping the labour, risk and odium attendant upon detailed mofussil management. The zemindars followed the suit and they made the talukdars proprietors in the same way as the Government had made the zemindars proprietors. The Patni Regulation was designed to provide a way to the zemindar to recover arrears of rent from the patnidars, almost identical with that by which the demands of Government revenue were enforced against themselves. Henceforth the zemindar had to be content with his rent reserved and the patnidar was the proprietor to the raiyyats. Hence has grown up the popular idea that the patnidar is also a proprietor. It is well-known that many of the mining leases are derived from patnidars and it is an astonishing fact that the zemindars have not challenged the patnidars' right except, as far as I know, in this case in which Prinsep and Hill, J.J., gave their decision.

The patnidar has been able to maintain his position that unless there was anything expressly reserved in the patni contract everything passed to him. One class of cases is that of chaukidari chakran lands. The last case in the subject is that of Ranjit Singh Bahadur v. Kali Dasi Debi (7) and it was the patnidar who got the lands. Recently there was the case of Surendra Narain Sinha v. Bejoya Singh Dudhoria (9) before this High Court. The zemindar sought to restrain the patnidar from making bricks and it was held that the zemindar could not complain when his property was not jeopardised nor his rent threatened. Chakravarty, J., discussed the nature of patni taluks and observed that "these patni taluks were really grants of the zemindar's interest without restrictions unless specially mentioned in the pattah."

Minerals were not thought of when these patnis were created. They were no more thought of when the Permanent Settlement was made with the zemindar. The position as between the zemindar and the patnidar is that the latter gets everything except what was expressly reserved. This follows from his position that he is a proprietor. The Regulation itself calls the tenure a taluk and the tenure-holder the talukdar and it is not unreasonable to hold that the old significance of the word taluk was retained. In s. 3 it is stated that the patnidar's property may be dealt with as other "real property." Mr. Field in his Digest of the Law of Landlord and Tenant, puts a note of interrogation against the words. I take it the framers of the Patni Regulation had the same idea in their minds as the framers of the Settlement of 1793 whereby they recognised and proceeded upon the footing that the zemindars are the actual proprietors of the land. In s. 11 again the patnidar is called the defaulting proprietor and attention was drawn by the Court in Ali Quader Syed Hossein Aly v. Jogendra Narain Roy (3) to the 2nd para. of s. 11 wherein it is mentioned that "the rent is in fact his reserved property in the tenure." The zemindar, therefore, has no grievance if his rent is not jeopardised. If there is no reservation, therefore, the minerals will pass to the patnidar.

Turning to the actual terms of the patni grant it is contended that there are no such terms as adhak and urdhak as in the case of Satya Niranjan Chakravarti v. Ram Lal Kaviraj (2) and that the words "darabast hakuk" in it are not enough since "mai hak hakuk" were not considered sufficient in Meghlal Pandey's case (1). My learned brother has dealt with the matter in detail on this point. I agree with him and all I need say is that all the exclusions and reservations were catalogued and there is along category of things conveyed, giving rise to the inference that everything else was granted by the instrument.

I agree, therefore, with my learned brother in the conclusions he has arrived at in the case.

Letters Patent Appeal against the judgment of Mr. Justice Spencer, in S.A. No. 881 of 1923, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Tuticorin, in A. S. No. 16 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Sriyaikuntam, in O. S. No. 383 of 1920.

Mr. T. L. Venkatarama Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. Swaminatha Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The question in this appeal is whether the plaintiff in the suit is entitled to claim interest and costs. Her deceased husband subscribed to a chit, of which the father of the defendant was the karaiswan. He paid 17 instalments before his death, after which the plaintiff paid the remaining four. The chit closed on 6th April, 1919, and Rs. 2,100 were then due to her. She claimed this sum but the karaiswan did not discharge till August, 1922, his pretext being that till that time her title was in question in a suit brought by her brother-in-law. This pretext did not commend itself to the District Munsif, who tried the suit or to the Subordinate Judge, who dismissed the first appeal. In second appeal, however, Spencer, J., came to the opposite conclusion, finding that the karaiswan was justified in withholding the money till the suit had been concluded.

The facts are these. The plaintiff's husband died in February, 1917. Some months later, the plaintiff applied for a Succession Certificate which was opposed by her brother-in-law on the strength of a Will alleged to have been executed by her husband, of which he produced not the original, but what purported to be a duplicate. A certificate was issued to the plaintiff on her "undertaking not to collect the outstandings due to the deceased for one month from the date of the certificate in order to enable the respondent to file a suit to prove the Will."

A few days later the suit was filed. The brother-in-law applied for an injunction against the widow but it was refused as regards the amount now in question. This occurred on 15th October, 1918. The intention of the Judge who granted the certificate is perfectly clear. The widow was not to collect the money for a month. If in that time no suit was filed, she could collect it at once. If a suit was filed, further proceedings were left to the Court which was seized of it. The brother-in-law failed to get a further stay and the karaiswan could not plead good faith when he refused to pay the money on the date on which it fell due. Nor was that all. A week after the injunction has been refused, the Munsif found on a preliminary issue of law that the Will propounded could not be sued on in the absence of Probate or Letters of Administration. The present 1st defendant was a defendant in that suit and was dismissed from it on 21st October, 1918. As the Munsif has remarked: "from that date he was free to pay the money to the widow." The Will had been pronounced to be useless and there was no injunction against him. Under the circumstances, s. 16 of the Succession Certificate Act afforded him a complete indemnity. It is idle to plead that it was still open to the brother-in-law to apply for Probate before his suit was disposed of, for he made no effort nor was he likely to do so. The karaiswan, however, went on refusing to pay on the ground that, if the brother-in-law's suit succeeded, he might have to pay twice over. As the Munsif has observed:

"The 1st defendant would have been lacking in bona fides in paying over to the plaintiff, only if he had reasonable grounds to suspect that the certificate was not validly obtained, but, when once the certificate had been placed beyond challenge by the alleged Will being put aside, the defendant could make no excuse to the holder of the certificate."

In these observations, we concur. We think, that the defendants did not act in good faith in refusing to pay, as they were completely indemnified. It is contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to interest as, in her notice, she claimed interest in the terms of the contract, which does not provide for it. We see no reason to accede to this contention. It is sufficient that she claimed interest. In what form or at what rate she claimed it is not material. We think that the Subordinate Judge's decision was right and restore it with costs throughout, subject to one reservation. The costs of the plaintiff's memorandum of objections, which was dismissed, must be excluded from the costs which have to be paid by the respondents.

Occupancy tenant—Mortgage of occupancy rights acquired under agreement with landlord—Mortgagor, whether can challenge mortgage.

The representatives of a tenant who has executed a mortgage of occupancy rights acquired by him under a settlement decree subsequent to the year 1868 as the result of an agreement with the landlord are not entitled to challenge the mortgage on the ground that it is void in law.

Wazir Mohammad v. Har Prasad (1), followed.

Appeal against a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Sultanpur, dated the 21st April, 1927, modifying that of the Munsif, Sultanpur, dated the 23rd December, 1926.

Messrs. H. Husain and A. C. Mukerji, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. D. Sinha, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question for decision in this appeal is whether the representative of an occupancy tenant who has mortgaged his occupancy holding can challenge the mortgage on the ground that it is void in law. The answer to the question depends on whether the tenant was an occupancy tenant by Statute under s. 5 of the Oudh Rent Act of 1886 or whether he obtained his occupancy rights in some other way. In the present case the occupancy rights were conferred by a settlement decree subsequent to the year 1868 as the result of an agreement between the landlord and the tenant. The tenancy, therefore, is one covered by the proviso to s. 5, which says that nothing contained in the former part of the section shall affect the terms of any agreement in writing entered into between a landlord and tenant after the 22nd day of July, 1868. In my opinion there is ample authority of the Judicial Commissioner's Court to establish the principle that, in a case of this kind, the tenant cannot challenge the mortgage executed by the original tenant. It may be that the rights given to the tenant were not transferable, but this was a matter of contract between landlord and tenant and, though the landlord could object to a transfer on the ground that it was contrary to the agreement, the transfer itself was not contrary to law as would be the case if the tenant were one whose occupancy rights had been obtained under the provisions of s. 5 of the Oudh Rent Act. The previous rulings on this point were considered by a Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court in 1911 and their decision is published in Wazir Mohammad v. Har Prasad (1). The rulings cited by learned Counsel for the appellant are published in Umrao v. Narain (2) and Pratab Bali v. Suresh Dutt (3). Neither of these rulings appears to me to be an authority for the claim made by the appellant that he is entitled to challenge this mortgage and so resist the possession claimed by the mortgagee. The lower Courts have rightly followed the ruling cited in Wazir Mohammad v. Har Prasad (1). I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Income Tax Act (XI of 1922), s. 50—"Tax was recovered," meaning of.

The words "tax was recovered" in s. 50 of the Income Tax Act mean "tax was received by the Government", and must not be read as meaning "tax was refunded to the assessee under the provisions of s. 27 of the English Finance Act of 1920."

Case stated under s. 66 (1) of Act XI of 1922 by the Commissioner of Income Tax, Madras, in the matter of Messrs. Binny & Co., Ltd., (London) by agents Messrs. Binny & Co., (Madras).

Mr. M. Patanjali Sastri, Special Counsel for the Referring Officer.

Mr. Vere Mockett, instructed by Messrs. Moresby & Co., for the Assessee.

JUDGMENT.—What we are asked to determine is the meaning of the words

"tax was recovered" in s. 50 of the Indian Income Tax Act. It is contended by the assessee that the word "recovered" which ordinarily has the meaning of taking back must refer to the re-payment of tax in the United Kingdom referred to in s. 49 and that the words "tax was recovered" must be read as meaning tax was refunded to the assessee under the provisions of s. 27 of the Finance Act of 1920. Unfortunately for this contention we see that s. 50 is applicable not only to s. 49 but also to s. 48; and if we are to apply this meaning of the word "recovered" to s. 48, it would mean that when a person had obtained a refund under s. 48 he is given under s. 50 another year within which to apply for that same refund. This certainly makes nonsense of these two sections. The word "recovered" does not necessarily mean the actual taking back of what has been given as is obvious from its use throughout the Income Tax Act. In s. 18 (8) which deals with "deduction" of tax in advance, it is observed that "the power to levy by deduction under this section shall be without prejudice to any other mode of recovery", implying thereby that deduction is one mode of recovery. Similarly under s. 41 tax is "recoverable" from the Court of Wards, Administrator-General, etc., and there it does not mean, taken back. It is suggested that tax can only be recovered by coercive process. The Act does provide for recovery by coercive process but even then there is no taking back of what has been given any more than when the tax is received by voluntary payment. Possibly there is an implication in the word "recover" that the tax is a sum which has to be deducted out of the income as really belonging to Government, and in that sense the word "recovered" would bear the meaning of taking back. Section 44 (a) is also a very strong argument against the assessee's contention as to the meaning of the word "recovered". We are, therefore, satisfied that the words "tax was recovered" mean "tax was received by the Government."

It has been pointed out to us that this interpretation may cause hardship in individual cases where there has been delay on the part of the Income-tax Authorities in England in making the refund there, such delay not being due to the default of the assessee. We would point out that this hardship can only be obviated by an amendment of s. 50 and we are of opinion that this should be done by giving the Income-tax Commissioner power to extend the time in suitable cases. The petitioner will pay the costs of this application, i. e., Counsel's fee Rs. 250.

Obiter.—Under the present Civil Procedure Code an appeal may be preferred from a preliminary decree in a mortgage suit even after the passing of the final decree. [p. 128, col. 2.]

A preliminary decree is now an independent decree which is not absorbed by the final decree. The final decree is really dependent upon the preliminary decree, and if there is no appeal from the final decree but the preliminary decree is set aside on appeal, the final decree will necessarily fall to the ground. Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak (with him Babu Pramatha Nath Bandopadhyaya), for the Appellants.

Mr. Gunada Charan Sen (with him Babus Prosanta Bhusan Gupta and Suresh Chandra Talukdar), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

B. B. Ghose, J.—A preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the plaintiffs-respondents that this appeal is incompetent. The appeal is against the preliminary decree passed on a mortgage, dated the 24th of January, 1924. The final decree was made on the 28th of February, 1924. The appeal against the preliminary decree was filed on the 27th of May, 1924. It is, therefore, contended that having regard to some of the cases decided in this Court, this appeal is incompetent. Personally I am of opinion that the cases which have been decided after the passing of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1908 have not laid down the correct rule. Under this Code, a preliminary decree has an independent existence and by the appeal against the final decree one cannot attack the preliminary decree. The case was different under the old Code. What is now a preliminary decree was supposed to be a preliminary order and the final decree was held to absorb that order and by an appeal against the final decree that order might have been challenged. It was, therefore, held under the old Code that after the passing of the final decree in the case, the preliminary order had no separate existence, and, therefore, the appeal against that order was incompetent after the passing of the final decree. That reasoning, however, does not apply when the law is that you cannot challenge a preliminary decree by an appeal against the final decree. A preliminary decree is now an independent decree which is not absorbed by the final decree. The final decree is really dependent upon the preliminary decree, and if there is no appeal from the final decree but the preliminary decree is set aside on appeal, the final decree will necessarily fall to the ground. The mischief of the procedure suggested by the learned Advocate for the respondents is this. There may be a very good ground for appeal against the preliminary decree but there may be absolutely no ground for appeal as against the final decree which merely works out the directions made in the preliminary decree. To compel a party to appeal against the final decree against which there is no ground whatsoever to urge in order that his appeal against the preliminary decree may be heard, seems to me to amount to a farce. Mr. Sen very rightly recognises that position but he relies upon the decided cases of this Court. I may say that the other High Courts have not followed this practice. I would have thought it necessary to have this question referred to a Full Bench for final decision if the appellants had not taken steps which proper circumstances or not against a minor or his estate is another matter with which we are not concerned.

The second appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Where a matter which ought to have been laid in execution proceedings under s. 47, Civil Procedure Code, is brought up in a regular suit and the plaintiff asks the plaint to be treated as a proceeding under s. 47, Civil Procedure Code, the plaint ought to be returned for being presented as an application in execution proceedings in a proper Court. Second appeal against a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Gonda, dated the 28th March, 1927, confirming that of the Munsif, Utraula, dated the 12th August, 1926.

Mr. Radha Krishna, for the Appellants.

Mr. Ali Raza, for the Respondents.

ORDER.—This is the plaintiffs' appeal from the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Gonda, dated the 28th of March, 1927, affirming the decree of the Munsif of the same place, dated the 12th of August, 1926.

In the suit, out of which this appeal arises, the plaintiffs asked for a relief of declaration for a 2/3rds shar in certain plots of land situate in village Baundhar, Pargana Utraula, in the District of Gonda. They also prayed for possession of the same plots in the event it were found that they were not in possession. The Courts below dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by the provisions of s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

In the lower Appellate Court the plaintiffs asked that the plaint in the present suit might be treated as proceedings under

s. 47. The Court below has refused the prayer on the ground that proceedings under s. 47 were barred by the rule of res judicata, arising out of a previous order, to which reference shall hereafter be made.

We are of opinion that there is no bar of res judicata and the plaint in the present suit should have been returned to the plaintiffs for being presented as an application in execution proceedings to the proper Court.

The facts are as follows:—

One Bismillah Khan had a son Muhammad Khan and four daughters. Muhammad Khan entered in course of time into the possession of the entire estate of his father, Bismillah Khan, on the death of the latter. Eventually the three sisters and the representative of the deceased sister brought four suits for the recovery of their shares in the inheritance of their father, Bismillah Khan. Naturally Muhammad Khan was the foremost defendant in the suits. But while Muhammad Khan was in possession of the estate he had made several alienations. These alienees were made party defendants to the four suits. They were large in number and amongst them were the present plaintiffs. Muhammad Khan confessed judgment and there was another defendant who compromised with the plaintiffs of those suits. The suits were decreed against Muhammad Khan and the said defendants but they were dismissed against the present plaintiffs and also against other defendants. They were instituted on the 13th of July, 1915, and the decrees were passed on the 5th of August, 1918. All this happened in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Basti in the Province of Agra. The suits and the decrees included certain items of property which were situate in the District of Gonda. In that class of property were included the plots now in question. On the date of the suits mentioned above the plaintiffs of the present suit held a possessory mortgage of the plots in suit dated the 16th of February, 1915, executed by Muhammad Khan. During the pendency of those suits, that is on the 8th of March, 1916, they had obtained a sale-deed of the same property from the same Muhammad Khan.

It is agreed that the sale being pendente lite is wholly inoperative against the interest of the decree-holders of those suits; but there is no doubt that the mortgage subsists and the decrees of the four suits mentioned above had not the effect of wiping off the said mortgage for the simple reason that the plaintiffs of those suits were granted no relief against the present plaintiffs. In other words, their suit was dismissed against the latter. The mortgage, therefore, subsists.

It appears that execution proceedings were taken by the decree-holders first in the Basti Court and afterwards in the Court at Gonda. We have before us the four applications which were made in the four suits mentioned above in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Basti for execution (Exts. 24 to 27). There were two distinct reliefs for which prayer was made in those applications. One was for possession of the properties situate within the jurisdiction of the Basti Court. The second was for a certificate of transfer to the Gonda Court for execution proceedings being taken in that Court in respect of the properties situate in the District of Gonda. It follows that the reliefs did not embrace any proceedings against the present plaintiffs because the property in which they were interested was not situate within the jurisdiction of the Basti Court but was situate within the jurisdiction of the Court at Gonda. The plaintiffs, however, misconceived the scope of the execution applications and filed certain objections in the Gonda Court which were rightly thrown out by that Court on the ground that there were no execution proceedings being taken against them. The order is dated the 7th February, 1925, and is as follows:—

"The report of the execution clerk shows that the decree has not been executed against these objectors. They have, therefore, no grievance at present in the execution department. Their objection is, therefore, disallowed on this ground."

It is the above order which the Courts below in the present case consider to have the effect of res judicata in respect of the present proceedings. To our mind that order has no such effect. In the first place, as already pointed out, there was no relief sought in the applications with reference to which this order was passed against the present plaintiffs nor was any relief sought to be obtained in respect of the property situate in the Gonda District, as already said. In the second place, in the column relating to the name of the persons against whom execution was being applied for the only name entered is the name of Muhammad Khan and the confessing defendant of those suits. In the third place, the order under consideration rightly and clearly does not decide the merits of the objections which the present plaintiffs had laid before the Court responsible for that order. Indeed the effect of the order is simply this that the objections were premature and uncalled for. This leads clearly to the inference that the right to object would arise at a proper time and in a proper Court. We accordingly think that this was a fit case in which the plaint of the present suit should have been treated as proceedings under s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As such it could not be entertained by the Munsif into whose Court the plaint was filed. The proper Court was the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Gonda to whose Court the decrees were transferred for execution by the Court at Basti.

We accordingly allow this appeal, set aside the decrees of the Courts below and direct that the plaint of the present suit be returned to the plaintiffs-appellants for the purpose of being presented as an application under s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Gonda. In the matter of costs, we direct that the parties shall bear their own costs all through. The plaintiffs have at every stage of the proceedings until to-day seem to have taken a wrong course of conduct and they are, therefore, not entitled to any costs.

tion of suit with additional prayers—Suit, whether bad.

Certain worshippers applied for and obtained the sanction of the Collector under s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, for the institution of a suit against a trustee for a scheme and for certain specified reliefs. The plaint when filed included a prayer for rendering of accounts for which sanction had not been given but the said prayer was subsequently withdrawn.

Held, that the suit was not bad in toto though the extra relief not covered by the sanction could not be granted. [p. 135, col. 2.]

[Case-law considered.]

The reliefs mentioned in s. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code are not mutually exclusive and a suit is not bad merely because some additional reliefs which are incidental to the main relief for which sanction has been granted are also included in the plaint. [p. 135, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Bapatla, in O. S. No. 30 of 1923 (O. S. No. 90 of 1922, Principal Sub-Court, Bapatla).

Mr. T. V. Venkatarama Aiyar, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Ch. Raghava Rao and K. Kameswara Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against the decree in a suit filed for the removal of the defendants-appellants from the trusteeship of the plaint temple and for the framing of a scheme. The lower Court has ordered the removal of the trustees and framed a scheme. Objection is now taken mainly on the ground that the suit is bad as not being in accordance with the sanction granted to the plaintiffs by the Collector. In that sanction the Collector granted permission to oust the present trustees by filing a scheme suit. The contention for the appellants is that under ss. 92 and 93 of the Civil Procedure Code, under which sections this sanction was granted, the various reliefs mentioned in s. 92 are mutually exclusive, and that when a suit is filed for any one of these reliefs there must be specific sanction to that effect. The logical effect of this argument is that if sanction is given under cl. (g) for settling a scheme no orders could be passed by the Court directing accounts in the future or declaring what portion of the trust property shall be allocated to any particular object, or authorising any part of the trust property to be let etc. But in a scheme for the management of a temple these are almost necessary incidents and certainly probable incidents in the management thereof; consequently it cannot be held that all these reliefs are mutually exclusive when there is no provision to that effect in the section. In the present case sanction was given to file a scheme suit, namely, a suit, to settle a scheme for the proper management of the plaint temple. In framing such a scheme a Court must undoubtedly provide for some one to manage the institution and in so doing would be appointing a trustee under cl. (b) to s. 92. The appointment of a new trustee is the chief ground of the appellant's complaint for he cannot contend that sanction was not granted for the removal of the defendants themselves. Such a complaint, as shown above, has no force. The only prayer in the suit to which exception can be taken is that which asks the trustees to render an account of their management but that prayer was withdrawn and has not been granted.

Mr. Venkatarama Aiyar argues that that withdrawal is not sufficient to cure the defect but that the suit should have been dismissed in toto and relies on several cases in support of this proposition. The first one is Srinivasa v. Venkata (1) where it was held that when a sanction had included a claim for damages against the trustees and such a claim had been omitted in the plaint the suit was not within the terms of the sanction. In Venkatesha Mallia v. Bammampalli Ramayya Hegade (2) where a sanction had been granted to two persons and one alone sued, it was held that the suit was bad and similarly in Maddala Bhagavanarayana v. Vadapalli Perumallacharyulu (3) where two plaintiffs sued out of four to whom sanction had been granted. The principle underlying all these cases is that where it appeared to the Court that if the plaint as presented in Court had been before the authority granting the sanction it was possible that the sanction would not have been accorded to such a plaint that plaint was bad. Here the facts are quite different. The suit is in accordance with the sanction but an additional prayer which has not been sanctioned has been added and subsequently removed. Several similar cases have been cited and we may refer to Sayad Hussain Miyan v. Collector of Kaira (4), Nizam ul-Haq v. Muhammad Ishak (5) and Appeal No. 373 of 1924 of this Court. In all these cases it was held not that the suit was bad but that the extra reliefs sought for could not be granted but the other prayers were allowed. In the present case the lower Court has already disallowed the extra relief and, therefore, its decree is correct.

On the merits of the case it was sought to be argued that the plaint property was the archaka service inam of the defendants and not the property of the temple. At the time of the inam enquiry, statements were taken from various persons and we have the inam statement Ex. A and the inam register Ex. B. From these two documents it is clear that the inam was granted to the temple and not to the archakas. At the time of the inam enquiry in 1860 the defendants' ancestors were in actual possession of the lands and were parties to the enquiry; when, therefore, the matter was decided they must have known that the lands belonged to the temple and not to them. The defendants have been unable to adduce any evidence to show that they bona fide believed that they had a right to the property or that circumstances have changed since 1860. Inasmuch as they have set up their own right as against the temple and also have made alienations of the property it is clear that they have been properly removed from the trusteeship. It is useless for them to contend, even if they were not archakas—which is another disqualification for the office of trustee—that they ought to be appointed now. A scheme has been framed by the lower Court and the only objection taken by the appellants is that the word "fastis" in cl. 11 is wrong. A perusal of the decree shows that this is a clerical error for "families" and it may be corrected accordingly. There are, however, serious objections to the scheme as framed by the lower Court, i. e., the provisions made in it for the exercise by the Court of superintendence over the temple. It is not the Court on which this duty should fall for it is within the province of the various temple committees appointed throughout the Presidency. Under this scheme, therefore, for the words "the Court" there will be substituted the words "the temple committee having jurisdiction over the suit village" in para. I and in the succeeding paragraphs where the word "Court" occurs the words "the said temple committee" shall be substituted. As a result of this, para. 20 must be struck but and we also think that paras. 18 and 19 must be removed as they confer a right of procedure which is not strictly in accordance with law. Objection has been taken to the appointment of the three plaintiffs as the new trustees, but the lower Court has apparently exercised its discretion in the matter and we have no materials on which we can say that the discretion has been improperly exercised.

With the above modifications the decree is confirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

IN No. 300 OF 1925.

Babu Profulla Kamal Das, for the Appellant, they have taken in this case and which do not compel me to make such reference. The steps that they have taken are that they have made an application after the filing of their appeal to be allowed to amend their memorandum of appeal so as to make it also an appeal against the final decree. This procedure was suggested by the case of Kulada Prosad Chowdhury v. Ramanand Patnaik (1). We grant the application made on behalf of the appellants. Let the memorandum of appeal be so amended that it would be an appeal both as against the final decree as well as against the preliminary decree. Now we propose to deal with the merits.

The only point urged before us in the appeal was a question of limitation. The defendants Nos. 5 to 10 and 25 were alleged to have obtained the interest in the mortgaged property under a paramount title, that is to say, they had purchased in execution of a mortgage prior to that of the plaintiffs. But in the previous suit brought by the prior mortgagees the present mortgagees, who were puisne mortgagees were not made parties. Thereupon the right of the plaintiffs as puisne mortgagees to redeem the prior mortgage was left intact. Although the defendant No. 25 was impleaded in the suit long after the plaintiffs' suit as against the mortgagors was barred by limitation, still the plaintiffs' right to redeem defendant No. 25 was not barred. Therefore, the question of limitation as between the plaintiffs and the appealing defendants does not arise.

There is, however, a very small point with regard to the amount of money which the appealing defendants were held by the Court below to be entitled to on a sale of the mortgaged property. There is no objection by either party as to the form of the decree. The Court below has ordered the sale of all the properties mortgaged to the plaintiff and has allowed the appealing defendants a first charge on the purchase money for the amount of their mortgage debt under the previous mortgage bond. In working out that sum the appellants have been allowed somewhat less than what they might have been entitled to. The Subordinate Judge has only given them a decree for the amount which was sued for in the plaint. But under the decree in their mortgage suit the defendants were allowed interest at the bond rate of Rs. 1.80 till the date of redemption which was fixed for the 24th August, 1913. The appellants are, therefore, entitled to the interest up to that date on the amount sued for plus the costs and after that date interest on the whole at 6 per cent. per annum till the date of sale which was the 22nd of May, 1915. This sum has been worked out by the learned Vakils for both the parties agreeing to the figure as Rs. 2,400. The decree of the Subordinate Judge must, therefore, be varied to this extent that defendants Nos. 5 to 10 and 25 will get Rs. 2,400 out of the money realised by sale of the mortgaged properties prior to the plaintiffs in this case getting anything out of it.

With this modification this appeal is dismissed. There will be no order as to costs in this appeal.

This, however, will not preclude the appealing defendants or any other defendants from redeeming the plaintiffs' mortgage as directed by the decree of the Subordinate Judge, dated the 24th January, 1924.

RESPONDENT.

Madras District Municipalities Act (V of 1920)—Election Rules, r. 15—Voting by illiterate voter—Marking by polling officer in presence of candidates or agents, whether illegal.

In regard to marking of votes of illiterate voters, r. 15 of the Rules for the conduct of election to Municipal Councils under the Madras District Municipalities Act does not insist on the absence of the candidates or their agents from the place where the ballot paper is marked by the polling officer and, therefore, the marking by the polling officer in the presence of the candidates or their agents is not illegal.

Petition, under s. 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order, dated the 18th February, 1927, of the District Court of Anantapur, in O. P. No. 44 of 1926.

Mr. P. Siva Rao, for the Petitioner.

Mr. B. Somayya, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question that arises

(1) 61 Ind. Cas. 923; 33 O. L. J. 414; 25 O. W. N. 776; 48 C. 1036.

for decision is whether under r. 15 of the Municipal Election Rules an illiterate voting paper must be marked by the polling officer in secret, and not in the presence of the candidates or their agents. In the rules for election to the Local Boards there is a specific provision in the rule corresponding to r. 15 that this paper shall be marked in the presence of the candidates or their agents. There is also a similar provision in the English Electoral Rules. In the Municipal Rules as in the rules for election to the Legislative Council, etc., there is no such provision and r. 15 reads as follows:—

"If the voter is unable to read the ballot paper or to make a cross thereon, and applies for assistance in doing so, the polling officer shall read it for him and, if so required, mark the ballot paper according to the directions of the voter and give it to him to put in the ballot box."

It is contended for the petitioner that there is no direction that the polling officer shall go either to the place set apart for literate voters to record their votes or to some other place where the candidates and their agents are not, and that, therefore, there is no rule prohibiting the marking of the vote in the presence of the candidates. No reason has been put forward for the difference in the two sets of rules for the Local Boards and the Municipal Councils, respectively and, therefore, the matter resolves itself into a question of the interpretation of r. 15. There is no provision in the rule for the polling officer going apart or for the withdrawal of the candidate and their agents. No doubt secrecy as far as possible is the object of the rules and it might be considered that some such action as above should be adopted by the polling officer, but it might be remembered that in the case of illiterate voters there cannot be absolute secrecy as the polling officer must know for which candidate the vote is to be recorded. It is also to be noted that cl. 3 of r. 15 says that the marking of a ballot paper by the polling officer shall not be questioned "subsequently" on the ground that it was not in accordance with the voter's directions. The word "subsequently" may possibly imply that at the time of marking it can be questioned, but that is only a possible inference. I am, however, satisfied that there is no provision in the rules insisting on the absence of the candidates or their agents from the place where the ballot paper is marked by the polling officer and, therefore, the marking in the presence of the candidates cannot be said to be a violation of any of the rules. I must, therefore, allow this petition and as it is said that there are other objections which have not been disposed of by the learned District Judge, the petition will have to be referred back to him for disposal on the other points.

I may observe that the District Judge after finding that the paper had not been marked in the proper manner omitted to record a finding on the question of whether this non-compliance with the rules had affected the result of the election as required in r. 11, cl. (c) of the rules for decision of disputes.

The respondent will pay the petitioner's costs.

GAJJAN—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Adverse possession—Fallow land—Possession follows title.

Until 15th November, 1912, the land in dispute was shamilat land in the possession of the defendant. In July 1913 the land was partitioned and fell to the share of the plaintiff. The defendant did not sow any crop in 1913. After the 15th November 1913 the defendant was again in possession. A suit for possession was brought by the plaintiff on 9th November, 1925:

Held, that the suit was within time as the defendant's adverse possession must be held to have commenced only from 15th November, 1913.

In case of fallow land possession follows title.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Gujranwala, dated the 22nd December, 1926, reversing that of the Third Class Sub Judge, Hafizabad, dated the 12th April, 1926.

Mr. Mukand Lal, for the Appellants.

Mr. L. Saunderson, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—On the 9th November, 1925, the plaintiffs sued the defendant for possession of 25 kanals 11 marlas of land on the allegation that they were the owners and that the defendant had taken forcible possession four or five years before suit. The defendant replied that the land was his and he had been in adverse possession for some 40 years. The trial Court held that the land was shamilat land which was partitioned in 1913 when the land in suit fell to the share of the plaintiffs. This finding is not challenged and there is no doubt that title is in the plaintiffs. The trial Court further held that the suit was within time as the mutation of partition stated that the partition was to take effect from Kharif 1913. In the view of the trial Court this meant that the partition was to take effect any time during the kharif harvest of 1913 that is, up to the 15th of November, 1913. As the suit was brought on the 5th of November, 1925, it was held that it was within time. The plaintiffs' suit was, therefore, decreed. On appeal the learned District Judge held that the land was partitioned according to the meaning of the final order in the partition case as from the beginning of the Kharif of 1913. The kharif crop is sown in July. The lower Appellate Court goes on to state that if the defendant sowed this crop his possession became adverse from the time he sowed it and that the limitation started to run from the time of sowing the crop and not from the time of cutting it. It, therefore, held that the suit was barred by time on the assumption that the kharif crop was sown some time in July, 1913. Against this decision this second appeal has been preferred.

The only evidence on the record consists of the statement of the patwari who also proved certain copies from the khasra girdawari. It is clear from this evidence that there was no crop during the Rabi of 1913 and the Kharif of 1913. That means that the land was lying fallow from the 15th of November, 1912 to the 15th of November 1913. Before the 15th of November, 1912, the land was shamilat land in the possession of the defendant who, however, would be considered to be holding on behalf of all the co-sharers. After the 15th of November, 1913, the defendant again was in possession. In the meantime about July 1913 exclusive title had accrued to the plaintiffs. In these circumstances it seems to me that it must be held that the plaintiffs were in possession up to the 15th of November, 1913, as up to that time from the date when the partition took effect title was in the plaintiffs and the land was fallow. It was not till the 15th of November, 1913, that it can be said that the defendant was exclusively in possession of the land holding adversely to the plaintiffs. The suit is, therefore, within limitation and I accept the appeal and decree the plaintiffs' suit with costs throughout.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Tiruvalur, in A. S. No. 9 of 1924 (A. S. No. 163 of 1923, District Court, East Tanjore) preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Tiruvalur, in O. S. No. 582 of 1921.

Mr. K. Rajah Aiyar, for the Appellant.
Mr. A. Sundaram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The only point that arises in this second appeal has reference to the amount allowed to the defendant as the value of the improvements made by him the payment of which has been made a condition precedent before the plaintiff is allowed to recover possession of the property. The amount was allowed for the casuarina plants in the land in question. The lease granted by the mother was for 10 years. It is in evidence that even before admitted that he is not in a position to show that any portion of the expenditure was really incurred after the service of summons in the suit. If so, it follows that all the amount allowed to the defendant must have been incurred not only before the transaction was set aside but even before he had any legal notice of the claim on behalf of the plaintiff repudiating the same. There is no question about the amount itself. In these circumstances I do not see any reason or warrant for depriving the defendant who incurred the expenditure on the faith of the transaction. I think the lower Appellate Court was right in its judgment. The second appeal fails and must be dismissed.

I might add one word with regard to the order for costs which was referred to by Mr. Rajah Iyer and that was an order for costs to be paid personally by the next friend in the lower Appellate Court. Mr. Rajah Iyer wished to contend that the Court had no power to direct the cost to be paid by the next friend personally. He has, however, cited no authority for the position. I am aware that it has been the practice of Courts to direct in proper cases that the costs of a suit should be paid by the next friend of the minor plaintiff personally. I say in proper cases because it depends upon the discretion of the Court whether the Court considers the action or proceeding taken by the next friend on behalf of the minor plaintiff to be bona fide or prompted by any other consideration. No question of the exercise of discretion itself has been raised before me. It has been argued on the question of the power of the Court itself. If the Court should have no such power it follows that it would be within the power of any man passing in the street to exploit and ruin the estate of a minor by merely seeking to file a suit for and in the name of the minor and saying that the costs of the other side ought to be paid or directed to be paid from the estate of the minor. I should be surprised if the Legislature intended any such consequence. The costs of the suit should always be within the discretion of the Court and when the Court is satisfied that a certain proceeding was such that the minor's estate should not be made liable in respect of the same but should be paid by the next friend personally the Court has the right to do so. Whether the next friend has any right of reimbursement in

10 years. It is in evidence that even before admitted that he is not in a position to show that any portion of the expenditure was really incurred after the service of summons in the suit. If so, it follows that all the amount allowed to the defendant must have been incurred not only before the transaction was set aside but even before he had any legal notice of the claim on behalf of the plaintiff repudiating the same. There is no question about the amount itself. In these circumstances I do not see any reason or warrant for depriving the defendant who incurred the expenditure on the faith of the transaction. Where a Court proceeds with the execution in the absence of such certificate it acts without jurisdiction and the proceedings are liable to be set aside in revision. [p. 141, col. 2.]

Petition for revision of an order of the Senior Sub-Judge, Ferozepore, dated the 25th August, 1926.

Mr. C. H. Carden Noad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Mulk Raj Chhibbar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The estate of Sodhi Richhpal Singh came under the management of the Court of Wards under ss. 9 and 10 of Act II of 1903 on the 18th March, 1926. At that time there was an outstanding decree for Rs. 15,000 with costs against the ward. The decree-holder had, on the 13th December, 1925, i.e., prior to the estate coming under the Court of Wards, applied for execution and a certain house was attached. Though it is alleged to be a very valuable property, it was knocked down to the decree-holder for Rs. 400 at the auction sale which took place on the 6th July, 1926, i.e. long after the estate had come under the Court of Wards. On the 9th August, 1926, i.e., 33 days after the date of the auction sale, the Manager of the Court of Wards appeared before the Executing Court and presented an application that all the proceedings were void as the estate was in the charge of the Court of Wards and it was necessary for the decree-holder to inform the Deputy Commissioner before he could proceed to execute his decree. The Executing Court on the 25th August, 1926, treated this as an application objecting to the sale and held it to be time-barred as it had been presented more than thirty days after the sale. Consequently the Executing Court confirmed the sale on the above date. Against this order this application for revision has been preferred.

It is obvious that there was no objection to the sale but a general objection by the Manager of the Court of Wards that the Executing Court has no jurisdiction to go on. This being the case, this is not so much an appeal as a revision against the order of the Executing Court, dated 25th of August, 1926, on the ground that it acted without jurisdiction in going on with the execution proceedings when it had been brought to its knowledge that such proceedings were barred under Act II of 1903.

It was admitted before me that under the provisions of Chap. VI of Punjab Act II of 1903 it was necessary for the decree-holder after the 18th March, 1926, to obtain a certificate from the Deputy Commissioner before he could proceed any further with his execution. It is true that it is stated in s. 31 (1) that the Deputy Commissioner should not disallow any claim based upon a decree, but from s. 31 (2) it follows that, after the 18th March, 1926, all suits and all proceedings in execution of any decree against the ward should have been stayed until the plaintiff or decree-holder filed certificate that the claim had been notified in accordance with s. 26. In the present case the Deputy Commissioner was never approached and no certificate was ever obtained. It follows that all the proceedings after the 18th March, 1926, were without jurisdiction.

It was argued on behalf of the respondent that proceedings could now be stayed by me in order to allow him to obtain the necessary certificate. This is, however, impossible as the proceedings have ended. Though the Deputy Commissioner may be compelled under s. 31 (1) of the Act to allow a claim based upon a decree, still the application for the certificate would have put him on his guard and allowed him to make arrangements for paying off the decree or coming to a settlement with the decree-holder. He had no such opportunity in the present case. There is no doubt that the Executing Court had no jurisdiction to go on with the execution after the 18th March, 1926. I, therefore, accept this petition and set aside all the proceedings of the lower Court regarding the sale of the house in question. I, however, maintain the attachment upon the house in question. But further proceedings for the sale of the house cannot be taken until the decree-holder files a certificate under s. 31 (2) of Punjab Act II of 1903. The petitioner will have his costs here.

*Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXVIII,
r. 1—Attachment before judgment of property of minor

A conditional order which simply prevents the property involved in a suit against a minor from being alienated pending the disposal of an application for the appointment of a guardian cannot be said to be invalid merely because the guardian proposed subsequently comes and states he is unwilling to act: [p. 143, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Cocanada, in A. S. No. 53 of 1923, presented against that of the Court of the Additional District Munsif, Cocanada, in O. S. No. 171 of 1923.

Mr. P. Somasundaram, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. Somayya, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question in this second appeal is whether the property of defendants Nos. 3 to 5 purchased by the plaintiff was subject to the attachment before judgment ordered in O. S. No. 128 of 1919. That was a suit brought by the 1st defendant herein against defendants Nos. 3 to 5 and their maternal uncle for a sum of money said to be due to the 1st defendant. The plaint was presented to the Court on the 19th June, 1918. An application was made for attachment before judgment on the 17th July, 1918. The District Munsif ordered conditional attachment on 17th July, 1918, and the conditional order of attachment was made absolute on 13th August, 1918. Defendants Nos. 3 to 5 were minors at that time and the 1st defendant their maternal uncle was proposed as their guardian. He seems to have informed the Court before 14th August, 1918, that he was unwilling to act whereupon the 1st defendant (plaintiff in that suit) proposed their mother, Ramalakshmi, as guardian of the minor defendants. That application was supported by an affidavit of the same date. In the affidavit it is stated: "The 1st defendant has refused to act as guardian." It is quite clear, therefore, that on the date on which the order for attachment was made the minors were not represented by a proper guardian. The question is whether the order for attachment was good in the absence of a proper guardian to represent the minors in the suit? The Subordinate Judge has held that there was a proper attachment and the plaintiff having purchased the property subject to the attachment he is not entitled to treat the property as if it was not subject to the attachment. The contention of Mr. Somasundaram is that as there was no proper guardian for the minors at that time, therefore, the minors could not be properly represented and the order against them could not be valid. No doubt an order made against minors who are not represented by a proper guardian would be infructuous but in this case there is the fact, that the order for conditional attachment was made on 17th July, 1918, and at that time the uncle was proposed to be the guardian. Subsequently he came and expressed his unwillingness to act as guardian and the question is whether the conditional attachment is a good attachment or a bad attachment. It is usual for a plaintiff to file an application along with the plaint for the attachment of the property of the defendants and if there are minors in the suit to propose some person as their guardian. If afterwards the guardian is found unwilling to act the Court appoints a proper guardian. But the conditional attachment made in the hope that the proposed guardian would act cannot be said to be invalid by reason of the proposed guardian being unwilling to act. The Court should see before making the conditional order absolute that a guardian is appointed to properly represent the minors as the guardian might represent to the Court that the plaintiff has not made out a good case for attachment before judgment or that he is willing to give security for any decree that may be passed in the suit, and, therefore, the attachment before judgment is not necessary. Therefore an order absolute for attachment before judgment could not be made in the absence of a proper guardian. But a conditional order that simply prevents the property from alienation by the defendants pending the disposal of the application cannot be said to be invalid merely because the guardian proposed comes and says he is unwilling to act.

In the view we take the conditional order for attachment still subsists. The fact that the petition has been disposed of would not in any way affect the question of the propriety and the validity of the conditional attachment, but as there is no order absolute as regards the attachment against the minor defendants, the proper course would be for the District Munsif's Court to treat the application as if on file and proceed with it according to law. If the Munsif finds that the plaintiff is able to make out a case in the circumstances of the case existing in July, 1918, then he should make the conditional order absolute but if he finds that the circumstances existing in July, 1918, would not justify an order for attachment before judgment, he should dismiss the petition. If he makes the order absolute then the property would be subject to the attachment order so made. The appellant herein will be entitled to intervene in the proceedings to show that the conditional order for attachment should not be made absolute. The appellant is entitled to the costs of this second appeal.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 89

The purchaser of a part of a non-transferable holding is entitled to have a sale of the holding for arrears of rent set aside on making a deposit under O. XXI, r. 89 of the Code of Civil Procedure, even though the holding has been purchased by the landlord himself. [p. 144, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an application by a decree-holder who is at the same time the auction-purchaser of a non-transferable occupancy holding and the landlord. The landlord obtained a rent decree and has purchased the holding at the execution sale. Thereupon the opposite party who claimed to have purchased the entire holding from the tenant, but who has been found by both the Courts below to have purchased a part only of the holding from the tenant, seeks to exercise the right given by r. 89 of O. XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Courts below have both held that he is entitled to exercise that right and the landlord applies in revision to us to hold that the purchase of a part of a non-transferable occupancy holding is not within the language of r. 89. The matter is a very important one and it is difficult not to have recourse to a comparison with s. 170 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. At first the course of decisions under s. 170 appears to have tended in favour of a purchaser of the non-transferable jote, but it is now settled by decisions that such a purchaser does not come within the description in sub-s. (3) of s. 170 of "any person having in the tenure or holding any interest voidable on the sale." Now the language of that section is different from the language of r. 89 which speaks of a person "either owning such property or holding an interest therein by virtue of a title acquired before such sale." It is now settled as, I have said, that such a person as the opposite party before us does not hold an interest voidable on the sale. That seems to be reasonably clear upon the wording of sub-s. (3), because if the sale is to stand at all it is quite clear that the transfer to the previous purchaser cannot subsist with it. An interest voidable on the sale means an interest the existence of which is compatible with the auction-purchase, though a qualification of it, as for example, an encumbrance. We have, however, to apply r. 89 and we find that both the Courts below have proceeded upon the decision in the case of Omar Ali Majhi v. Moonshi Basirudeen Ahmad (1), where it was definitely laid down under s. 310-A of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1882 that such a person as the opposite party before us, has the right to have a sale set aside on paying the money prescribed as a deposit under s. 310-A of the previous Code. I am far from saying that the question is an easy one. To my mind there are three governing principles. In the first place, it does not seem to me to matter for purposes of r. 89, whether the purchaser is a purchaser of a part or of the whole of a non-transferable occupancy jote. In the second place, it seems to me unreasonable that any difference should be operated by the fact that the landlord happens to be the auction-purchaser himself. It is anomalous that the landlord by using the machinery of the Code should be able to give a better title to himself as an auction-purchaser than he could have given in the same way to a third party auction-purchaser.

The other matter that seems to me to govern the consideration of this question is this:—If the withdrawal of the deposit made under r. 89 is to mean that the landlord has recognised the depositor as tenant of this non-transferable occupancy jote then it does seem anomalous that such a person as the opposite party here should have the right to make the deposit. It clearly cannot be the law that the landlord by the machinery of r. 89 can be obliged either to go without his rent or to recognise the transferee whom he does not wish to recognise in the case of a non-transferable jote.

There are other difficulties and serious difficulties in the question before us and when I find that as far back as 1902 this question was decided by a Division Bench in favour of a purchaser of a portion of a non-transferable occupancy holding, I am obliged to follow that ruling unless I can be persuaded that it is a ruling from which this Court ought to differ. In that case it would be our duty to refer the matter—and a very important matter—to a Full Bench for decision. On the whole I am not prepared to say that I differ from the ruling laid down in Omar Ali Majhi v. Moonshi Basirudeen Ahmad (1). I doubt extremely whether it is true that a mere acceptance or withdrawal of this deposit would operate to oblige the landlord to recognise this tenant but, whether it be true or not, it is perhaps somewhat late in the day to abridge still further the rights of a transferee of a non-transferable occupancy jote in Bengal. It would be putting back the clock to overrule the decision which is more than 20 years old and to hold that the interest which such a person as the opposite party before us has obtained from the tenant is no interest at all or that merely because the landlord is the auction-purchaser he cannot exercise the right under r. 89. On the whole I think this is a case where we ought to obey the principle of "stare decisis."

In my judgment this Rule should be discharged with costs: hearing-fee two gold mohurs

JUDGMENT.

Cuming, J.—In the suit out of which this appeal has arisen the plaintiffs who are the appellants in this Court sought to enhance the rents of some 17 tenants. These persons were holding separate lands separately under the landlords. They sought to enhance the rent first on the ground of rise in the price of the staple food crops, and secondly, they asked for additional rent for additional area on the ground that the tenants were holding more lands than what had been settled with them. What practically amounts to 17 suits have been tried together as a single suit. The inconvenience of this procedure is only too obvious and it is quite possible that the plaintiffs have suffered from having adopted this procedure. Be that as it may, the law allows this procedure to be adopted and the plaintiffs having deliberately adopted this procedure can hardly now complain.

The Assistant Settlement Officer dismissed the suit on both grounds. He would seem to hold that the jamias were mokarrari ones being held at a fixed rate of rent from the time of the Permanent Settlement and also that the landlords had failed to prove that there had been any increase in the area. The landlords-plaintiffs appealed to the District Judge. With regard to what I may describe as 4 khatians, namely, Nos. 14, 18, 21 and 32 he decreed the appeal so far as it concerned the claim to enhancement of rent on the ground of rise in the price of the staple food crops. With regard to the claim for additional rent for additional area he dismissed the appeal as regards these khatian numbers also. With regard to the other 13 khatians he dismissed the appeal.

The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court. They contend that as regards khatians Nos. 16, 24 and 19 it is quite clear from the construction of the kabuliyats that these kabuliyats are not confirmatory as held by the learned District Judge and they further argue with regard to all the khatians that the lower Appellate Court was wrong in holding that the landlords having failed to prove the original area on which the present rent was based had failed to prove that there had been any increase in area. They would seem to contend that there were certain kabuliyats and in these kabuliyats certain areas were stated and these kabuliyats formed the basis of the contract, that it must be taken that the area as given in these kabuliyats was the amount of lands for which the defendants agreed to pay the rent mentioned in the kabuliyat and, therefore, it was sufficient for them to show that the present area was much larger than the area given in these kabuliyats. The simple answer to this contention is this—the landlords in order to succeed in showing that there had been an increase in area were bound to prove what was the area of the tenancy at the time of its inception. This is the principle laid down in the case of Rajkumar Pratap Sahay v. Ram Lal Singh (1). The kabuliyats in these cases do not really form the contract on which the tenancies are based. They are really only confirmatory of the former contract and nothing more. It cannot, therefore, be said that the defendants having agreed in these kabuliyats to pay so much rent for a certain area stated in these kabuliyats it would be sufficient for the landlords to show that the present area varies from that area. As I have stated these kabuliyats being only confirmatory and not the original contract it is necessary for the landlords to show as is laid down in the case of Raj Kumar Pratap Sahay v. Ram Lal Singh (1) what was the area at the inception of the tenancy. We are not prepared to interfere with the finding of the learned Judge on this point that the landlords having failed to prove what the original area was on which the present rent was based they were not entitled to additional rent for additional area.

The learned Vakil for the appellants has then specifically argued with regard to khatians Nos. 16, 24 and 19, and he argues that on proper construction of the kabuliyat in khatian No. 16 there has been a change of rent. In this kabuliyat it is stated that the original rent was Rs. 29-4-0 and that the defendant now pays Rs. 29, four annas being kept in suspense or hajat. In other words the rent is nearly the same, namely, Rs. 29-4. Four annas out of this rent is kept in suspense and it is open to the landlord at any time to insist upon the payment of this four annas. In other words, the rent is Rs. 29 4 0. There is really no change in the rate of rent in this khatian. This kabuliyat, therefore, does not prove that there has been any change in the rate of rent so far as khatian No. 16 is concerned.

With regard to khatian No. 24 the position would appear to be this the landlords purchased it at a rent sale and after the sale he re-settled the land with the same tenant. The learned Vakil argues that in this case there has been a break in the continuity of the tenancy, that although the land was settled again with the same tenant he cannot be considered as successor-in-interest of himself. There has been a break because his present tenancy is a new tenancy although it has been settled with the same tenant at the same rate of rent. This contention, we think, is sound. It is quite clear that the landlords having purchased it at a rent sale were entitled to the khass possession of the tenancy of the former tenant. It was open to them to have settled it at any rate they chose. In our view this constitutes a new tenancy and the presumption under s. 50 of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply. As regards khatian No. 24 the appeal will be decreed and the case will be remanded to the Court of first instance to determine how much, if any, increase the landlords are entitled to for the rise in the price of the staple food crops.

With regard to khatian No. 19 the position would appear to be this. The original holder sold or transferred a half of his tenancy. The landlord recognized the transferee as his tenant. It seems to us that in this case a new tenancy was created and, therefore, presumption under s. 50 of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply and the landlords in this case are entitled to an increase on the ground of rise in the price of the staple food crops. Khatian No. 19, therefore, must be remanded to the Court of first instance to be determined how much if any increase of rent the landlords are entitled to for rise in the price of the staple food crops. The appeal with regard to khatians Nos. 19 and 24 is decreed and the costs will abide the result—hearing-fee one gold mohur.

The appeal with regard to the other khatian numbers will stand dismissed with costs. Hearing-fee three gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 642 of 1926 is not pressed and is dismissed with costs. Hearing-fee one gold mohur.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 57, 66—Sale proclamation—Omission to mention income, effect of—Execution petition "closed"—Attachment, whether terminates.

The omission to specify in a sale proclamation the income of the properties proclaimed for sale does not necessarily render the proclamation defective. [p. 139, col. 1.]

Under O. XXI, r. 57, Civil Procedure Code, an attachment of properties made in execution of a decree terminates only on the dismissal of the execution application by reason of the default of the decree-holder. [p. 139, col. 2.]

Held, that the petition could not be held to have been dismissed and that the attachment did not, therefore, terminate under O. XXI, r. 57, Civil Procedure Code. [ibid.]

Appeal against an order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Coimbatore, in E. A. No. 77 of 1925, in E. P. R. No. 241 of 1924; in O. S. No. 20 of 1918, dated the 13th August, 1925.

Mr. S. T. Srinivasa Gopalachariar, for the Appellants.

Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Iyer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an application by the judgment-debtor in O. S. No. 20 of 1919 on the file of the Subordinate Judge of Coimbatore to set aside the sale in execution of the decree in that suit, under O. XXI, r. 90, Civil Procedure Code. Various irregularities alleged to vitiate the sale have been brought to our notice by the learned Counsel for the appellants, but we are satisfied that there is no substance in any one of them.

It was stated that the sale proclamation was settled in the absence of the judgment-debtor. The facts show that the notice for the settlement of the sale proclamation was served on the appellant, and in it, it was stated that the sale proclamation would be settled on the 25th October, 1924. On that day, he did not go before the Court. The proclamation, as a matter of fact, was not settled on that day but the consideration of the question was adjourned to the 6th of November, 1924. It was again adjourned to the 19th January, 1925. If the sale proclamation was settled in the absence of the judgment-debtor, it was due to his own fault, because he did not present himself in Court on the 25th October, 1924. If he had done so, he would have known the precise date when it was intended to settle the sale proclamation. We will now consider whether the proclamation was defective or the sale was held contravening any of the provisions of law.

It was urged that in the sale proclamation the decree holder did not make any mention of the income accruing from the properties. We have not been referred to any rule of law or procedure which makes it incumbent on the decree-holder to specify in the sale proclamation the income of the properties, though it would be very useful for the intending bidders if the income is mentioned. Very often the income of the properties put up for sale is mentioned in the sale proclamation but the omission to mention it does not necessarily make the sale proclamation defective.

The next ground which has been very strongly pressed before us was that the properties have been undervalued, that they were sold in the absence of a sufficient number of bidders and that they were purchased by the decree-holder himself paying only small sums over the upset price mentioned in the sale proclamation. The properties were sold in 5 lots of which the first three lots consisted of encumbered properties, the 4th and 5th lots being unencumbered ones. It is true that the decree-holder purchased these encumbered properties paying only small sums in addition to the upset price. But this was not due to any fraudulent conduct on his own part. As pointed out by the learned Counsel for the respondents, at the time of the sale these items were subject to a mortgage of about Rs. 13,000. That probably was one of the reasons why the properties did not fetch any high value. It is true there were only two or three independent bidders, but this again, has not been shown to be due to any conduct on the part of the decree-holder. The evidence shows that the sale proclamation was duly published in the locality and tom-toms were beaten and the Amin sent a return to the effect that everything that is usually done has been done in this case. It very often happens that only persons living in the neighbourhood of the properties sold appear for making bids at auction-sales and when they find that the properties are encumbered, they do not come forward with high bids. The present case seems to be one of such instances. Items Nos. 4 and 5 were unencumbered properties and we cannot say that the evidence shows that they were sold for a low price. In these circumstances the argument that the properties were sold for a very low price and were purchased by the decree-holder himself does not carry much strength.

The last argument was, that at the time of sale there was no attachment in existence. The point was not very seriously pressed by Mr. Srinivasa Gopalachariar because the facts show that it is not possible to urge the point with any force. In the execution petition filed prior to the present one, the decree-holder omitted to mention the existence of an encumbrance and the Court ordered that "the petitioner may file fresh petition for sale giving the amount due to him." So, the petition then pending was "closed" and the present petition was filed by the decree-holder. In these circumstances there can be no doubt that the present application is only a continuation of the prior application and there has not been any termination of the attachment. The order 'petition closed' does not in this case mean that the petition was dismissed. There are no circumstances to make O. XXI, r. 57, Civil Procedure Code, applicable; there has been no dismissal of the prior application by the default of the decree-holder. So this petition also falls to the ground.

It has not been proved that the sale held was irregular and that there was any substantial injury resulting from it to the judgment-debtor. We must, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

In passing, we may observe that an application was filed by the judgment-debtor on the 16th January, 1925, to issue a fresh proclamation making various allegations. The learned Judge accepted that application, issued notice to the other side but proceeded with the sale and concluded it on the 19th without disposing of this application. We must observe that it would have been more satisfactory in the circumstances if the learned Judge disposed of the application before holding the sale. One or two mis-statements of fact contained in the judgment were brought to our notice by the learned Counsel for the appellants, but we have not discussed them in the judgment as we are satisfied that they do not affect the disposal of the case on the merits. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), s. 112—Tender of patta to heir of deceased pattadar with name of deceased pattadar, whether bad—Persons with joint right—Right of some alone to sue.

In the case of a ryot coming under the Madras Estates Land Act the heir stands in the shoes of the ryot and is entitled to bring a suit under s. 112 of the Act and a tender of patta made to the heir with the name of the deceased pattadar is not, therefore, bad.

Persons who have got a joint right should join in an action to assert that right and it is not open to one or two persons who have a joint right along with others to bring a suit for the assertion of that right on behalf of all without joining them as defendants.

Mr. Watrap S. Subramania Aiyar, for the Appellants.

Messrs. B. Sitarama Rao, L. Venkatanarasiah and R. Rama Subba Aiyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—There is no point of law in this batch of second appeals except in the few cases noticed below. In A. S. No. 561 of 1923 the pattadar died in February, 1921, and the patta was prepared in May 1921. It is urged by Mr. Subramania Aiyar, for the appellant [that the tender of patta with the name of the deceased ryot is not a proper tender of a proper patta. But the tender was made on the daughter who was the heir of the pattadar. In the case of a ryot coming under the Madras Estates Land Act the heir stands in the shoes of the ryot and is entitled to bring a suit under s. 112. That being so, there is no force in the argument that the tender made to the heir with the name of the deceased pattadar is bad.

With regard to S. A. Nos. 1515, 1520 and 1526, it is urged that the learned District Judge was wrong in dismissing the suit on the ground that all the persons interested in the holding did not join in the suit. It is an elementary principle of law that persons who have got a joint right should join in an action to assert that right and it is not open to one or two persons who have a joint right along with others to bring a suit for the assertion of that right on behalf of all without joining them as defendants. The judgment of the learned District Judge is correct on this point.

With regard to S. A. No. 1511, there is no question of law.

The only other point urged is with regard to Vakil's fee in the lower Court. We think the District Judge was right in allowing Rs. 5 as Vakil's fee in each case. In this Court we allow a consolidated fee of Rs. 150 for the whole batch.

The second appeals are dismissed with costs.

Under the rules for the conduct of elections under s. 55 of the Madras City Municipal Act, a notification fixing the date of election has to be published by the Governor-in-Council. But a notification published in the Gazette by the order of the Government, Ministry of Local Self Government, is proof under s. 78, Evidence Act, of the order of the Government fixing the election and must be presumed to have been issued in accordance with law and consequently valid. Such a notification does not contravene s. 49, Government of India Act and is not liable to be called in question in any legal proceeding. [p. 145, col. 2.]

Where under r. 6 of the Election Rules framed under s. 55 of the Madras City Municipal Act the Commissioner prepared and published three days before the date fixed for election a schedule of valid nominations, but his order excluding a candidate from the schedule was called in question before the Chief Judge, Small Causes Court, and was ultimately upheld, and the election was ordered to be held on a subsequent date:

Held, that the original schedule of nominations having been published as prescribed by the rules was in force and was available for the election which was ordered to be held on a subsequent date and that a fresh publication of nomination papers was not necessary. [p. 146, col. 1]

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against an order made under s. 45 of the Specific Relief Act and relates to the holding of the election of a Councillor for the 29th Division of this City. A great many objections to the validity of the proceedings prior to the actual election were taken before the learned Judge in the lower Court but he has disposed of nearly all of them in favour of the appellant. The ground on which he granted this order staying the election was that the order of Government and its notification in the Fort. St. George Gazette fixing the date of election as the 30th September, 1926, were invalid because they were not proved to be orders framed in accordance with law. The learned Judge held that the order had to be one made by the Governor-in-Council meaning thereby the Governor in consultation with his Ministers. It was suggested that there were rules under which the order had been issued and that in accordance with those rules the order was a perfectly valid one within the meaning of s. 49 (1) of the Government of India Act. The learned Judge, however, held that the power of the Governor-in-Council could not be delegated and could not be exercised under any departmental rules by any persons other than those constituted as the proper authority. No rules were produced in the lower Court because neither party was in a position to obtain these rules from Government but now the learned Advocate-General on whom the notice of this appeal was served appears and has produced a copy of the rules framed under s. 49. Apart from these rules it seems to us that the learned Judge was wrong in disregarding the Government order and the notification. The notification fixing the election was published in the Local Gazette and under s. 78 of the Evidence Act, it is proof of the order of Government fixing that election. Under s. 114 of the Evidence Act a presumption arises that all official acts are regularly done. There is, therefore, a presumption that this act of publication was done regularly, namely, in accordance with the rules. Rules are contemplated under s. 49 and, therefore, we may presume that the notification was properly published in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. In addition we have a Government order produced which itself orders the publication of the notification in the Gazette and that Government order is authenticated as being by order of the Government, Ministry of Local Self Government complying with the rules framed under s. 49 which have not been shown to be ultra vires. We are, therefore, satisfied that the order was properly published and consequently under s. 49 itself these proceedings and orders cannot be called in question in any legal proceeding.

This disposes of the appeal so far as the appellant is concerned; but the respondent seeks to support the order on various other grounds. Those grounds relate to the interpretation of the election rr. 1 to 6 and have been dealt with fully by the learned Judge in the lower Court, and we agree in his conclusion on all points except one. This point relates to r. 6 of the Election Rules. That rule lays down that three days before the election the Commissioner should prepare a schedule of valid nominations of candidates for election and prescribe further procedure. This schedule of valid nominations was prepared by the Commissioner before the date originally fixed for election namely, the 22nd September, 1926. Objections were taken to this list but they were not upheld and, consequently, when the final orders of the Chief Judge had been passed, the list of valid nominations remained the same as originally framed. This having been published as prescribed by the rules was in force and was available for the election which was ordered to be held on a subsequent date. We consequently hold that the provisions of r. 6 were satisfied in this case. In the result the appeal must be allowed and the petition dismissed with taxed costs throughout.

—Small Cause decree by Munsif—Application for execution against immoveables—Formal order of transfer to regular side, whether necessary—Rejection of application—Appeal.

An application for execution of a decree passed by a Munsif in the exercise of his Small Cause powers, was made to the Munsif with an affidavit addressed to him as a Small Cause Court Judge and containing a prayer that execution may be levied against immoveable properties after the issue of a certificate. The Munsif, without passing a formal order of transfer dismissed the application on the ground of limitation :

Held, that the provisions about transfer and those of O. XXI, r. 6, Civil Procedure Code, were in effect complied with, that the order of the Munsif must be deemed to have been passed by him in his capacity as a Munsif and not as a Judge of a Small Cause Court, and that the order of dismissal was, consequently, appealable. [p. 147, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

Mallik, J.—This Rule was directed against an order passed by the Subordinate Judge of Hooghly setting aside an order passed by a Munsif, Serampore, whereby an application for execution of a Small Cause Court decree had been rejected. There had been a Small Cause Court decree passed and when an application for its execution was made, it was made to the Second Munsif of Serampore who in his capacity as a Small Cause Court Judge had passed that Small Cause Court decree. In the application for execution it was stated that as the judgment-debtor had no moveable properties, action might be taken against his immoveable properties. The officer before whom this application for execution was filed and who exercised two functions—one as a Small Cause Court Judge and another as a Munsif—rejected the application for execution on the ground of limitation. Against this order an appeal was filed before the Subordinate Judge and the Subordinate Judge, as stated above, allowed the appeal setting aside the order passed by the Munsif.

The contention on behalf of the petitioner before us has been that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal inasmuch as the order appealed against had been passed by a Small Cause Court Judge, an order passed by a Small Cause Court Judge being final in these matters.

On behalf of the opposite party it was said that the order passed by the Munsif against which the appeal was preferred before the Subordinate Judge was not an order passed by a Small Cause Court Judge but by a Munsif in his ordinary regular capacity. We have looked into the records of the case and from the records it appears that the application for execution was addressed to the Munsif, Second Court, Serampore, but it was accompanied by an affidavit wherein the Munsif was described also as a Small Cause Court Judge, and wherein a prayer was also made for the issue of a certificate. On behalf of the petitioner it was argued that this was not in accordance with the provisions about transfer of an application for execution or in accordance with the provisions as laid down in O. XXI, r. 6 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is true that no specific order about transfer or sending the application for execution was passed by the Munsif before whom the application was made, but taking the application along with the affidavit we are of opinion that the provisions about transfer and of O. XXI, r. 6 were in effect complied with, and that being so, the order passed by the Munsif rejecting the application for execution was, in our opinion, passed by him, not in his capacity as a Small Cause Court Judge but by him as a Munsif. In this view of the matter, the learned Subordinate Judge, in our opinion, was justified in entertaining the appeal and we are unable to hold that when he set aside the order passed by the Munsif he passed the order without any jurisdiction.

The result, therefore, is that the Rule is discharged with costs, hearing-fee one gold mohur.

Municipality—Power to cut off water supply, limits of—Failure of ratepayer to pay charges other than water rates—Water supply, whether can be cut off—Rules, construction of—Right to present consolidated bill, effect of—Suit for injunction and damages, whether maintainable.

A Municipal Committee presented the plaintiff, a rate-payer, with a consolidated bill for water rate and other charges. The plaintiff paid the water rate but did not pay up the other charges. The Committee declined to accept payment and cut off the water supply to the plaintiff. The bye-laws of the Municipality gave power to the Municipality to cut off water supply for default in paying water charges. In a suit by the plaintiff for a mandatory injunction for restoration of water supply and for damages incurred by him for procuring water from other sources:

Held, (i) that inasmuch as the power to cut off water supply was given by the bye-laws in the limited event of default in payment of water charges, the Municipality was not entitled to cut off the water supply to the plaintiff; [p. 147, col. 2.]

(ii) that the fact that the Municipality was entitled under the rules to present a consolidated bill for all charges did not entitle them to cut off the water supply. [ibid.]

(iii) that the plaintiff was entitled to a mandatory injunction to restore the water supply; [p. 148, col. 1.]

(iv) that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the damages incurred by him, even though he could have prevented the same by paying up the balance due under the bill. [p. 148, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Surat, in Appeal No. 56 of 1924, confirming the decree passed by the Joint Subordinate Judge at Surat, in Civil Suit No. 256 of 1923.

Mr. R. J. Thakor, for the Appellant.

Messrs. P. B. Shingne, Government Pleader, and B. D. Mehta, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The points involved here really lie in a small compass. The plaintiff was liable to the Committee of Management of the Surat Municipality for various rates, including certain water charges. Under r. 245 of the Surat Municipal Rules the Municipality was entitled to send one consolidated bill for the aggregate dues. The plaintiff refused to pay the consolidated bill. He tendered merely that part of the bill which related to water charges and to one other item. The Municipality declined to allow him to pick and choose in this way, and they next proceeded to cut off his water supply.

Now there is an express power given to the Municipality as regards the water supply. That is bye-law 6 of Chap. XI which provides that "the Municipal Commissioner may, at any time, stop or cut off a private connection in any of the following events, viz., (1) in default of payment of water charges in respect of the private connection, within one month of the date of the presentation of the bill, till all arrears are paid." But there is no bye-law enabling them to cut off the water supply because charges other than water charges are not paid. On the other hand, the general remedy given by the Act in the event of the Municipal dues not being paid is that mentioned in s. 83, viz., a distress warrant.

The Municipality justify their action on the ground that as they were entitled to present this consolidated bill, it followed that they could cut off the water supply if it was not paid. Both Courts below held against them on this point. In our judgment the learned Judges were quite correct. The power to cut off a water supply is a very serious power, particularly in a tropical country. And where the bye-laws give a specific remedy, viz., to cut off the water supply in certain limited events, in my judgment it necessarily follows that in the absence of any other provisions of the Act, or the bye-laws or the rules, the Municipality is not entitled to cut off the water supply on grounds other than those expressly mentioned and authorised.

The result of their contention put forward before us would entirely alter bye-law 5, and turn it into something quite different from what it really is. It, therefore, follows that in what the Committee of Management did, they were acting illegally as found in the lower Courts.

Next comes the question of what relief should be granted. The trial Court granted a mandatory injunction to restore the water connection. That injunction has been complied with. The only variation made by the lower Appellate Court was to add certain words that, "the decree shall be without prejudice to the future exercise by the defendants of any powers vested in them at any time by Statute or rules thereunder or by contract." This followed the form of injunction in another case in which the Surat Municipality were concerned, viz., Surat City Municipality v. Tyabali Daudbhai (1). Under these circumstances we think it is unnecessary to vary the order of the learned District Judge in this respect. It may, however, be pointed out that in the case of Surat City Municipality v. Tyabali Daudbhai (1) there was an injunction granted to restrain the cutting off of the supply, whereas here there was a mandatory injunction to restore it. Consequently, it may well be that in the former case some qualifying words had to be inserted because otherwise the injunction might in form operate perpetually. But here there was merely a mandatory injunction to restore the water supply and it ceased when it was complied with, for there is no injunction here to maintain the supply when so restored. In any event it clearly follows that whether or no the above words are inserted the restoration of the supply is without prejudice to future circumstances, e. g., if the plaintiff refused to pay the water charges in future. So there is no substance in the point.

Next coming to the question of damages, which is perhaps the only substantial point in the case, the learned trial Judge awarded the plaintiff Rs. 135-8-6 because this was the amount spent by him for labour charges to secure water from a particular well after the supply had been cut off. He accepted the plaintiff's evidence on that point, and accordingly awarded him those damages. On appeal this amount has been reduced to a rupee. As I understand the judgment of the lower Appellate Court, this is because the plaintiff could have minimised the damages by paying up the whole amount of the consolidated bill, and then bringing some subsequent proceedings to recover the illegal amount. But that is not the true legal position. The defendants here were making an illegal demand in threatening to cut off the water supply if the consolidated bill was not paid. If then the plaintiff had complied with it, he might have been left without a legal remedy because the remaining dues, besides the water charges were, in fact properly payable by him. The illegal demand would, therefore, have succeeded.

Then, as regards the other suggestion put forward, viz., that the plaintiff was acting contumaciously in refusing to pay what was justly demanded of him, that again seems to me to miss the real point. The defendants were acting in excess of their legal powers, and the plaintiff was entitled to object to their so doing. If in consequence the defendants took the law into their own hands and cut off this man's water supply, I think it only reasonable that they should pay for the consequences. The sum awarded by the lower Court was merely out of pocket expenses. There is nothing here in the way of inflated damages. Accordingly, in our opinion, the judgment of the trial Judge on this point ought to be restored.

Then, as regards the Surat Municipality who have been added since the appeal to us, was presented, I should explain that the events in suit happened at a time when the Municipality had been suspended, and when a Committee of Management had been appointed by Government under the Act. That suspension has now terminated, and the Municipality is once more in possession of its powers and has now been brought on the record. But it was the Committee of Management who were actually the parties concerned when the events in suit happened, and also at the trial and for the matter of that in the lower Appellate Court as well. Accordingly, it must be understood that, while we think the decree must be maintained against the Committee of Management, it will be without prejudice to any right they may have of indemnity or otherwise against the Surat Municipality or the funds of the Municipality.

There was an argument that the Committee ought not to be made liable because they were acting under a bona fide belief that they had the requisite powers in cutting off the water supply in respect of other taxes. But, as pointed out by the learned District Judge, that belief is really an untenable one, and Dhondu Dagdu Patil v. Secretary of State for India (2) affords no ground for the contention put forward in that respect on behalf of the respondents, even supposing there was an Act which protected acts done under a bona fide belief that they were in exercise of statutory powers.

Under these circumstances we think the appeal must be allowed in part. The variation made by the Appellate Court in the decree, viz., that it is to be "without prejudice to the future exercise by the defendants of any powers vested in them at any time by Statute or rules thereunder or by contract" is to stand. But the appellate order as to damages and costs is to be vacated, and the judgment of the trial Judge restored both as to damages and costs. As regards the costs in the lower Appellate Court and in this Court, they must be paid by the respondents other than the Surat Municipality. The Municipality can bear their own costs. Cross-objections dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

Raza, J.—This is an appeal from a decree of the District Judge of Fyzabad, dated 22nd October, 1926, setting aside a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Sultanpur, dated the 20th May, 1926. The dispute in this case relates to the partition of certain plots in village Barsanda in the District of Sultanpur. The partition was made by the Revenue Court and the plaintiff has brought the present suit in the Civil Court questioning the jurisdiction of the Revenue Court in making the partition.

It is admitted by the parties that the partition officer did allot the land in suit, which is the subject-matter of the present suit, to defendant No. 1 (Mir Irshad Ali) and that the partition proceedings in Revenue Court were confirmed in June, 1925. It is difficult to understand what does the plaintiff mean by contending that the Revenue Court had no jurisdiction to make the partition. The Civil Court has no jurisdiction to go behind the ultimate allotment of lands at a partition made by the Revenue Courts. The Civil Court cannot question the final allotment made at the partition simply because some intermediate orders made in the course of partition have not been properly carried out: see Jagan Nath Parshad v. Ram Dutt (1). As pointed out (1) 11 Ind. Cas. 531; 14 O. C. 153.

in the case of Sanwal Singh v. Bhikhari (2), a suit for possession by a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to a portion of the land wrongly allotted to the defendants in partition by the Revenue Court, does not lie in the Civil Court in view of the exclusive provisions of s. 233 (k) of the U. P. Land Revenue Act. It is clearly a matter relating to the partition of a mahal, for the plaintiff's claim cannot be decreed without affecting the partition come to by the Revenue Court.

So far as the orders in question are concerned they were properly passed by the Revenue Court which had full jurisdiction to pass these orders under ss. 118 and 119 of the Oudh Land Revenue Act (Act III of 1901). The Civil Court has no jurisdiction. The plaintiff's suit for a partition of his one-fourth share in the building standing on plot No. 143 is, of course, cognisable by the Civil Court as held by the learned District Judge. The learned Judge has passed proper orders about the partition of the building. No case has been made out to disturb the judgment of the learned District Judge. The result is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Pullan, J.—I agree with the order proposed. It is remarkable that the appellant has sought to rely in this Court on ss. 118 and 119 of the Land Revenue Act. These sections are really fatal to his claim. He seeks actual possession of a one-fourth share of a house, which has never been in his possession, but has always been in the possession of the opposite party, and similarly he seeks actual possession of a one-fourth share in certain orchards which are attached to the house. It is to meet such a case that ss. 118 and 119 were enacted. Under s. 118 the Court is bound to permit the co-sharer, who is actually in possession of a dwelling house, to retain it on the condition that he pays a reasonable ground rent and under s. 119 the Court may apply the same principle to an orchard. These sections clearly contemplate that the Court, that is the Revenue Court, actually makes the partition both of the land on which houses are situated and of orchards, and the Civil Court has, therefore, no right to interfere with a partition made by the Revenue Court in accordance with these sections. When the Court of first instance criticised the action of the learned Commissioner he seems to have been unaware that the learned Commissioner was exactly following the law as laid down in s. 118 of the Act and the criticism is entirely beside the mark. It is impossible to agree with the learned Counsel for the appellants in his contention that a house is inseparable from the site and that because the Revenue Court cannot divide the buildings it, therefore, cannot divide the site on which the buildings stand. That the contrary is the case is clear both from the Act itself and from numerous rulings of the Judicial Commissioner's Court to which it is not necessary to refer. The lower Court has already given the appellant all that a Civil Court can give, that is a share in the buildings which make up the house in dispute, and the learned District Judge has very properly left the decision of the amount to be paid as compensation to the Court below preparing the final decree. On these grounds I agree with the proposed order.

Succession Act (X of 1865), s. 187—Unprobated Will, whether can be pleaded in answer to claim of heir-at-law.

A defendant resisting a claim made by the plaintiff as heir-at-law can rely in defence on a Will executed in his favour at Madras in respect of property situate in Madras when the Will is not pro-bated and no Letters of Administration with the Will annexed have been granted, provided, however, that he does not do so in order to establish a right under the Will. [p. 155, col. 1; p. 156, col. 2.]

Where in a suit by the heir-at-law, the defendant relies on and pleads a Will, the mere existence of the Will does not necessarily displace the plaintiff's title. It is necessary for the defendant to go further and to prove that some one other than the plaintiff has title under the Will and this the defendant cannot do by virtue of s. 187 of the Succession Act. [p. 155, col. 2.]

[Case-law considered.]

There is nothing in s. 187 of the Succession Act which would in terms make it applicable only to the case of plaintiffs and not to the case of defendants. [p. 155, col. 1.]

Appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Kumaraswami Sastri, dated the 29th October, 1924, and passed in the exercise of the Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction of the High Court in C. S. No. 755 of 1920.

This appeal coming on for hearing on the 2nd and 3rd September, 1926, upon perusing the grounds of appeal, the judgment and decree of the High Court, dated the 29th October, 1924, and passed in the exercise of its Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction in C. Venkatasubramiah*, for the Respondent, and the case having stood over for consideration till the 1st December, 1926, the Court (The Chief Justice and Curgenven, J.) made the following ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

Phillips, Offg. C. J.—The plaintiff in this case is one Ganshamdoss Narayandoss, and he sued for the recovery of a house No. 2/100, Perumal Mudali Street, impleading originally one Saraswathi Bai, who is now dead, and subsequently putting on the record Gulab Bi Bai, her legal representative. The property belonged to one Kaveri Bai, and it may be taken for the purposes of this reference that in the absence of a Will, the plaintiff, Ganshamdoss Narayandoss, would be entitled to succeed Kaveri Bai in preference either to Saraswathi Bai or Gulab Bi Bai. The claim is resisted on the ground that Kaveri Bai left a Will in favour of Saraswathi Bai. That Will was not probated, and the question is whether it can be used to defeat the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff by para. 5 of his plaint alleges that Kaveri Bai died intestate on the 16th of October, 1908. In my opinion that was an unnecessary allegation. But it resulted in the 1st issue in the suit being framed as follows: "Did Kaveri Bai die intestate as alleged in para. 5 of the plaint or after making her last Will and testament as alleged in para. 3 of the written statement?" The learned Judge obviously attached importance to the form of the pleading and the issue, because he says this: "In the present case the plaintiff comes to Court saying that Kaveri Bai died intestate and that he is the heir under Hindu Law claiming by intestate succession." In my opinion that burden was not one which lay upon him and the allegation in the pleading was an unnecessary averment. I think that all he had to do was to prove that he was the next of kin of the last owner of the property, Kaveri Bai, and thereupon the burden of proof would be cast upon the defence to show that the defendant had a better title. It would be to my mind wholly wrong in this country to allow the burden of proof to be shifted by a redundant averment in the pleading or by an incautious acceptance of an issue framed upon that averment. I am, therefore, of opinion that it would be wrong in determining where the burden of proof lies in this case to rest it upon the form of pleading and the issue and that we ought to consider where the burden lies in law.

The learned Judge held that an unprobated Will could be used to defeat the plaintiff's claim and reiterated the view which he had expressed on the subject in Shadagopa Naidu v. Thirumalaswami Naidu (1). The doctrine is alleged to be derived from the case of Janaki v. Dhanu Lall (2). I do not wish to embarrass the Full Bench by comments on the cases which will be discussed before them. But I think it is very doubtful whether Janaki v. Dhanu Lall (2) really supports the proposition contended for though it was taken to establish that proposition in Carlapatti Chinna Cunniah v. Cota Wammalivarriah (3). I confess myself unable to ascertain what exactly was laid down in Parthasarathy Aiyar v. Subbaroya Gramony (4). On the other hand, the observations in Lakshamma v. Ratnamma (5) seem clearly to tend in the opposite direction. My own view would be not merely that an unprobated Will could not be used to establish title which is clearly forbidden by s. 187 of the Succession Act but that it could not be used as a weapon of defence when the onus was clearly thrown upon the defence. But I realize the difficulty created by s. 25 of the Succession Act which defines intestacy in the following words: "A man is considered to die intestate in respect of property of which he has not made testamentary disposition which is capable of taking effect." Where the evidence establishes a valid execution of a Will, it is difficult to say that an unprobated Will is not capable of taking effect because it is obvious that as soon as Probate is obtained it can take effect. The position would then be that the burden would be thrown upon the plaintiff by law, and not by the accident of the way in which he framed his pleading, of proving that the testatrix died intestate and that applying the definition of s. 25 this testatrix did not die intestate. The practical inconvenience of putting an executor in the position of being able to refuse to take out Probate and keep the presumptive heir-at-law at arm's length by an unprobated Will requires no comment. In my opinion the matter had better be settled by a reference to a Full Bench and the question referred will be as follows: Can a defendant resisting a claim made by the plaintiff as heir-at-law rely in defence on a Will executed in his favour at Madras in respect of property situate in Madras when the Will is not probated and no Letters of Administration with the Will annexed have been granted?

Curgenven, J.—This is an appeal against the judgment of Mr. Justice Kumaraswami Sastri in C. S. No. 755 of 1920 on the file of this Court. The property in suit consists of a house and site in George town Madras, valued in the plaint at Rs. 12,700. It belonged to one Kaveri Bai, sister of the plaintiff's father, and the plaintiff claimed to recover possession of it as her heir. The claim was resisted by a half sister of Kaveri Bai's named Saraswathi Bai, who obtained possession upon Kaveri Bai's death in 1908 and who set up a Will of Kaveri Bai's as the foundation of her title. Saraswathi died during suit, and her sister, Gulab Bi Bai, was brought on the record as her legal representative. The learned Judge has found in favour of the Will and dismissed the suit, and the plaintiff appeals.

The Will was attacked on the grounds (a) that it was not genuine, (b) that it was not executed in accordance with law and (c) that being unprobated the defendant could not rest any claim upon it. Point (a) was given up in appeal. Points (b) and (c) remain for consideration.

The document purports to bear the mark of Kaveri Bai, to which is subscribed a declaration that it was "signed by the testatrix and acknowledged by her to be her last Will and testament in the presence of us present at the same time who at her request and in our presence and in the presence of each other have subscribed our names as witnesses." There follow four signatures, the first in order being that of Mr. Seshacharlu, the Vakil who, as the evidence shows, prepared the Will. Mr. Seshacharlu died not long afterwards, and although the genuineness of his signature is fully proved by his clerk, it cannot, I think, be presumed that it amounted to a valid attestation. Neither of the two reputed attestors who have been examined speaks to his presence at the execution of the document, and one would have expected that, had he been present, the words 'Mark of Kaveri Bai' would have been in his hand. It is not improbable that he signed as the author of the document. Of the other three persons whose signatures appear, two, Rangildoss and Poolji Vias, deposed respectively as defendants Nos. 1st and 2nd witnesses. The learned Judge has alluded to the circumstance of Gulab Bi Bai's conversion to Muhammadanism as a reason for suspecting that any bias which these witnesses may have would be against her, so that if evidence of valid attestation of the Will can be derived from their statements, it may be accepted with little hesitation. Rangildoss stated that he saw Kaveri Bai put her mark, that he was asked to sign below and that he did so. That constitutes a valid attestation under s. 50 of the Succession Act. The account given by the other witness, Poolji Vias, is this: He was called to the house by the executor named in the Will, Rancholedoss. Kaveri Bai was lying in bed ill. Rancholedoss told him that "it was the Will of Kaveri Bai," and asked him to attest it. Kaveri Bai also said that he should sign, and he signed. He does not remember whether the testator's mark was already there, but it may be inferred from an answer which he gives to another question that Rangildoss's signature was already on the document, and there is Rangildoss's evidence that Kaveri Bai put the mark in his presence. Thus it is to be gathered from what Poolji Vias says that Kaveri Bai had already executed the Will, that a statement was made to him in her presence that the Will was hers, and that both she and her executor asked the witness to attest it and he attested it. It remains for consideration whether this satisfies the requirement of s. 50 that an attesting witness, where he has not actually seen the testator, either by himself or by another under his direction, sign or affix his mark, must have received from the testator a personal acknowledgment of his signature or mark. A 'personal acknowledgment' of execution need not necessarily, I think, be restricted to an express statement to that effect, but may include words or conduct, or both, on the part of the testator which may be construed unequivocally as such an acknowledgment. Here we have not only a statement made in Kaveri Bai's presence that the Will was hers, and a request to attest it—which evoked no disclaimer from her—but also her own request to the witness to sign. It appears to me that she thus conveyed to the witness an impression that she avowed execution no less certain than if she had made the avowal in terms. It was thus, by implication, an acknowledgment. It was a personal acknowledgment because the impression was created directly by her own words and conduct. I conclude, therefore, in agreement with the learned Judge, that this witness also validly attested the Will, which has thus, so far as execution and attestation are concerned, been established.

The question now remains whether Saraswathi or her legal representative (she died pending suit) can resist the plaintiff's claim without obtaining Probate of the Will. The plaintiff alleged that Kaveri Bai had died intestate, and it appears to me that such an allegation was necessary, because under Parts IV and V of the Succession Act an heir-at-law can only succeed in the event of an intestacy. But since there is a presumption that a person dies intestate unless a Will be established, it lay upon the defendant to disprove the fact of intestacy by establishing the existence of a Will. That, I think, was the course followed in this suit. The defendant proved that Kaveri Bai had executed a Will, but that proof was adduced otherwise than by producing Probate, and the question is whether, by such proof, the plaintiff's claim is defeated.

By s. 25 of the Succession Act, a man is considered to die intestate in respect of property "of which he has not made a testamentary disposition which is capable of taking effect." Did Kaveri Bai make such a disposition? The answer, I think, is clearly "yes." She made a valid Will, and even though that Will be still unprobated, it was, and indeed still is, capable of giving effect to her intentions. That proposition has not been disputed. Thus she did not die intestate, and it appears to me to follow that any claim by an heir who would succeed upon an intestacy must necessarily fail.

So far as I can see, the only way in which the plaintiff could surmount this difficulty would be by showing that the Will could not be established against him, in which case the Court would have to infer an intestacy. Recourse for this purpose has been had to s. 187. This section provides that "No right as executor or legatee can be established in any Court of Justice, unless a Court of competent jurisdiction (in British India) shall have granted Probate of the Will under which the right is claimed." Clearly this does not amount to saying that a Will may not be proved for any purpose otherwise than by producing Probate, but only for the purpose of establishing a right as executor or legatee. But it is argued for the plaintiff that title to the property must vest in some one, that prima facie it vests in him, that only by proof of a superior title can his title be displaced, and that this section renders such proof inadmissible. His title must, therefore, prevail.

I would meet this argument by saying that for the defendant to prove title in himself is not indispensable. He may plead, "I may not be able to prove my own title, but it will do if I show that title cannot vest in you, and to do this I have simply to establish the Will." I cannot see that the plaintiff has any answer to this form of defence if, as I am disposed to hold, his claim fails upon an adjudication against him upon the issue of intestacy. Once the intestacy has been found against, the plaintiff has no better claim than anyone else to oust the defendant, however, infirm or incapable of proof may be her title, and upon this view it would be immaterial whether the defendant was (or represented) an executor or legatee, or was a mere third party or trespasser.

To hold that the intestacy could not be disproved by establishing the unprobated Will would be to give s. 187 an effect similar to that of s. 49 of the Registration Act, according to which a document required to be registered, and which is unregistered, cannot be received in evidence. If that had been intended, I do not see why it was not expressed. It may then be said that the construction which I put upon the Statute would lead to very inconvenient results. The argument, of course, cannot avail if, as I am compelled to find, the Statute is clear. No doubt there may be cases in which an executor who fails to obtain Probate causes loss and trouble to others. There being no period of limitation, it is possible for him to postpone indefinitely the settlement of claims upon the estate. On the other hand, the position would hardly be more satisfactory, if, as in a case like the present, the testator's wishes could be rendered ineffectual by a mere omission to probate a perfectly good Will.

I have not thought it necessary to discuss the case-law, as the learned Judge has already done so, and as we have decided to refer the question to a Full Bench. I agree to the terms of the reference proposed.

The reference was heard by Sir William Phillips, Kt., Officiating Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Beasley and Mr. Justice Ananthakrishna Aiyar.

OPINION.

Phillips, Offg. C. J.—The question referred to us is: Can a defendant resisting a claim made by the plaintiff as heir-at-law rely in defence on a Will executed in his favour at Madras in respect of property situate in Madras when the Will is not probated and no Letters of Administration with the Will annexed have been granted?

This question deals with the provisions of s. 187 of the Indian Succession Act, X of 1865, which is to the effect that no right as legatee can be proved by a Will of which Probate has not been taken. It has been held by this Court in Carlapatti Chinna Cunniah v. Cota Wammalivarriah (3) that this objection to proving title by an unprobated Will applies only to a plaintiff and it was held "that a defendant is not precluded by that section from relying upon a Will as he is not seeking to establish a right as executor or legatee." Janaki v. Dhanu Lall (2) was cited as authority for that proposition. On a reference to Janaki v. Dhanu Lall (2) with all respect, it seems very doubtful whether any such proposition is there put forward. In that case the 1st defendant had obtained a decree against the personal representatives of the deceased man who was said to have left a Will, and subsequently the deceased's mother, who would have been his representative in the absence of a Will, brought a suit to set aside that decree. It was then held that, "though the executors can establish no right without taking Probate, the existence of the Will cannot be ignored for all purposes whatsoever." It was also observed "that the decision in Prosunno Chunder Bhattacharjee v. Kristo Chytunno Pal (6) is applicable, and that the persons, who took possession of Ghulab's estate upon his death, were liable to be treated by the creditor (1st defendant) as his representatives even though themselves liable to be dispossessed by the executors on taking out Probate." It was, therefore, held that the 1st defendant's decree was not a nullity and it was open to him to prove that Ghulab left a Will and, therefore, the plaintiff was not a person who could claim to set that decree aside. It was clearly in the minds of the Judges that the executors could establish no right without taking Probate, and yet the existence of the Will was in the circumstances allowed to be proved. That is not authority for the proposition that a defendant is not precluded from establishing a right under an unprobated Will, as was held in Carlapatti Chinna Cunniah v. Cota Wammalivarriah (3). I am strengthened in this view by the fact that Prosunno Chunder Bhattacharjee v. Kristo Chytunno Pal (6) was relied upon by the learned Judges in Janaki v. Dhanu Lall (2). In that case no question was decided under s. 187 of the Succession Act. It was merely held that a decree having been obtained against the de facto manager of the deceased's estate, the decree was not a nullity and, even if it cannot be executed against the estate in the hands of the executors when he has taken out Probate, it is at any rate sufficient to enable the plaintiff to bring a suit against the executor in order to have the decree satisfied. In fact, the executor had actually obtained Probate.

There is nothing in s. 187, which would in terms make it applicable only to the case of plaintiffs and not to the case of defendants, and this view has been taken in several cases, in opposition to Carlapatti Chinna Cunniah v. Cota Wammalivarriah (3). The first of these is, Lakshamma v. Ratnamma (5) where, however, Carlapatti Chinna Cunniah v. Cota Wammalinarriah (3) does not appear to have been cited. Again in Parthasarathy Aiyar v. Subbaroya Gramany (4), Chandra Kishore Roy v. Prasanna Kumari Dasi (7), and Basunta Kumar Chuckerbutty v. Gopal Chunder Das (8) no distinction is drawn between a plaintiff and a defendant. There is, however, a remark of Schwabe, C. J., in Parthasarathy Aiyar v. Subbaroya Gramany (4) who, after stating "that a person who in Court has to prove title and has to deduce that title from a Will, whether that person is plaintiff or defendant, cannot do so without producing Probate," goes on to remark: "This would not prevent a defendant resisting a claim by an heir-at-law by producing and proving a Will of which Probate had not been granted." This observation must clearly be read as being limited to cases in which the claim could be resisted without establishing a title under the Will. This view has been taken consistently throughout and it is evident that there can be no objection to an unprobated Will being proved for certain limited purposes, provided that it is not sought to prove by the Will a right thereunder; for this is prohibited by s. 187.

The answer, therefore, to the question referred to us must be that a defendant can rely, on an unprobated Will, provided that he does not do so in order to establish a right under the Will.

As this answer will in no wise dispose definitely of the case before the referring Judges, I think I may add a few words on the facts of the case. The plaintiff is suing as heir-at-law, but he was resisted by the defendants who claim under a Will of which no Probate has been taken. It is argued that it is a sufficient answer to the plaintiff's case to allege and prove the existence of a Will; for in that case the plaintiff, who would be the heir in case of intestacy, would no longer have any right. This rather ignores one point which, I think, is important, namely, that the plaintiff being the heir under intestacy, which must be presumed until a Will is proved, is entitled to succeed to the property, unless it can be shown that his title has been displaced. If the defendant merely proves that a Will is in existence and does not prove the terms of that Will, that is not necessarily inconsistent with the plaintiff's title. In the first place, the Will may not be a valid Will and, in the second place, the plaintiff may be a legatee under the Will. The mere existence, therefore, of a Will does not necessarily displace the plaintiff's title. It is necessary for the defendant to go further and to prove that some one other than the plaintiff has title under the Will. This he cannot do by virtue of the provisions of s. 187. In the circumstances of the present case, I would, therefore, hold that the defendant cannot use an unprobated Will as a defence.

Beasley, J.—I agree.

Ananthakrishna Aiyar, J.—I agree. An argument based on the principle of the plea of jus tertii was advanced on behalf of the respondent on which I should like to say a few words. I find the principle of jus tertii referred to in Odgers' Book on Principles of Pleading and Practice, Chap. VIII, page 139, Ninth Edition: "If the plaintiff is in possession of any land or goods or can otherwise make out a prima facie title to them, it is not enough for the defendant to show a better title in some third person; he must also show that he acted as agent for such third person at the time he did the act complained of." Thus where a plaintiff makes out a prima facie title in him to the property in dispute, the defendant has to show a better title either in himself or in some third person. If what is stated above be the correct principle of pleading applicable to such cases, it follows that when the plaintiff in the present case shows a prima facie title in himself to the property in dispute—as the admitted heir-at-law of the last owner—the defendant has to show a better title either in himself or in some third person (in the words of the learned author quoted above) or "establish a right as legatee" (in the language of s. 213 of the Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925) in himself or in some third person. It seems to me, therefore, that where the plaintiff's prima facie title to the property is established, the defendant in order to non-suit the plaintiff should establish the title of the legatee. The general law would seem to be that the defendant's plea of jus tertii cannot be entertained when he does not state in whom (such) the right resides. The defendant must trace the title to a third party other than plaintiff. A mere suggestion that there may be a third party with better title is nothing [Chandra Kanta Pathak v. Bhagjur Bepari (9)]. It has been held by the Privy Council that "possession is a good title against all the world except the person who can show a better title"—Sundar v. Parbati (10), Narayana Row v. Dharmachar (11). Similarly a prima facie title made out by the plaintiff to the property in suit is, I think, a good title against all the world except against the person who can show a better title. This prima facie title of the plaintiff has no doubt to be proved by him if it be not admitted by the defendant; but when once plaintiff's prima facie title is admitted or proved, I think it follows that he must succeed unless the defendant is able to displace the plaintiff's prima facie title and prove a better title in some person other than the plaintiff. If such person's rights should happen to be as legatee under a Will, since the defendant has to prove such person's right as legatee, he comes within the scope of s. 213 of the Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925 (s. 187 of the old Act X of 1865) under which "No right as legatee can be established in any Court of Justice, unless a Court of competent jurisdiction... shall have granted Probate of the Will under which the right is claimed". We are not here concerned with that class of cases where no direct title to property is claimed under a Will,—the Will being relied on only to prove an authority to adopt or as containing an admission of the status of some other person—Achyutananda Das v. Jagannath Das (12), Manuel Louis Kunha v. Jnana

Coelho (13), Basunta Kumar Chuckerbutty v. Gopal Chunder Das (8).

My Lord, the learned Officiating Chief Justice, has in his judgment discussed the trend of decisions in this Court on the construction of the section. I think that the respondent in the present case has to establish the right of the deceased Sarawathi Bai as legatee of the suit property to displace the prima facie title of the appellant and under s. 213 of the present Act (s. 187 of old Act) she is not entitled to do so unless a Court of competent jurisdiction has granted Probate of the Will under which the right is claimed. I would accordingly answer the question referred to us in the negative, and hold that the defendant in the present case cannot use the unprobated Will as a defence to the suit.

INCOME-TAX COMMISSIONER, DELHI, AND ANOTHER—RESPONDENTS.

Income Tax (Amendment) Act (XXIV of 1926), s. 66A—Income-tax matters—Appeal to His Majesty in Council, when lies—S. 66A, whether retrospective—Interpretation of Statutes—Retrospective operation.

The right of appeal to His Majesty in Council under s. 66A of the Income Tax Act is confined to cases falling within sub-s. (2) of the said section, namely, to cases which are certified by the High Court to be fit for appeal to His Majesty in Council. [p. 157, col. 2.]

While provisions of a Statute dealing merely with matters of procedure may properly, unless that construction be textually inadmissible, have retrospective effect attributed to them, provisions which touch a right in existence at the passing of the Statute are not to be applied retrospectively in the absence of express enactment or necessary intendment. [p. 158, col. 1.]

Provisions which, if applied retrospectively, would deprive of their existing finality orders, which, when the Statute came into force, were final, are provisions which touch existing rights [ibid.]

Section 66A of the Income Tax Act does not, therefore, give a right of appeal to His Majesty in Council from orders passed before the coming into force of the enactment of the said section. [p. 158, col. 2.]

Petition for special leave to appeal from the order of the Lahore High Court (Mr.

Justice Broadway and Mr. Justice Zafar Ali), in C. M. P. No. 551 of 1926, dated the 18th December, 1926, and reported as 100 Ind. Cas. 97.

JUDGMENT.

Blanesburgh.—These petitions are each of them for special leave to appeal from orders made by the High Court of Judicature at Lahore on references to that Court under s. 66 (2), Indian Income Tax Act, 1922. In each case the sum in dispute exceeds Rs. 10,000. In each the order in question was made before the 1st April, 1926, that in the first of the two cases being of date the 12th January, 1926, and that in the second having been made on the 6th January, 1926. In each case, also, the High Court refused to certify that the case was a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council. With these facts for its foundation, an interesting argument was addressed to the Board upon the nature of the statutory appeal in such cases as these, and upon the question whether in the present instances there is any such appeal at all.

The learned Judges of the High Court were of opinion that the petitioners had a right of appeal to His Majesty in Council provided they could, in effect, bring their cases within the requirements of s. 109 (c), Civil Procedure Code, but not otherwise. They dealt with the applications for certificates on that footing, and they dismissed them. Hence the present petitions.

At the hearing before the Board, the view of the High Court was resolutely challenged by the petitioners. It sufficed, it was contended, that the cases should fall within the requirements of s. 110 of the Code: the petitioners' right of appeal was in no way conditional on compliance with the requirements of s. 109 (c). The respondents, on the other hand, supported, as applied to the general case, the view of the High Court, but, contended that, for the petitioners here, there was, for reasons which will appear in the sequel, no statutory right of appeal at all.

These rival contentions raise questions of great general importance. It has seemed to their Lordships to be convenient that they should definitely pronounce upon them.

The legislative history of the subject is a short one. No express provision for appeals to His Majesty in Council from orders of a High Court in India made upon references either under s. 51, Indian Income Tax Act, 1918, or under s. 66 of the Act of 1922, is to be found in either Statute, but until the case of Radhakrishna Ayyar v. Sundaraswamier (1) was decided by the Board, it was apparently generally supposed in India that appeals from such orders were regulated by ss. 109 and 110, Civil Procedure Code, to which reference has already been made. The effect of the judgment in the case cited was, however, definitely to lay it down that from these orders there was, in fact, no statutory right of appeal at all. And such was the position until the 1st April, 1926, when the Indian Income Tax (Amendment) Act, 1926, came into force, by s. 8 of which it is provided that immediately after s. 66, Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, a section should be inserted, of which it is convenient to transcribe the first three sub-sections:

"66A. (1) When any case has been referred to the High Court under s. 66, it shall be heard by a Bench of not less than two Judges of the High Court, and in respect of such case the provisions of s. 98, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, shall, so far as may be, apply notwithstanding anything contained in the Letters Patent of any High Court established by Letters Patent or in any other law for the time being in force.

(2) An appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council from any judgment of the High Court delivered on a reference made under s. 66 in any case which the High Court certifies to be a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council.

(3) The provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, relating to appeals to His Majesty in Council shall, so far as may be, apply in the case of appeals under this section in like manner as they apply in the case of appeals from decrees of a High Court."

It is upon these sub-sections that the question now under discussion depends, and as to them it will be noticed that the appeal thereby given is by sub-s. (2) confined to a case which the High Court certifies to be a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council.

(1) 74 Ind. Cas. 584; 45 M. 475; 49 I. A. 211; 36 C. L. J. 450; 16 L. W. 18; 31 M. L. T. 31; 43 M. L. J. 323; 27 O. W. N. 1; A. I. R. 1922 P. C. 257; 20 A. L. J. 937 (P. C.).

These words are textually the same as the concluding words of sub-s. (c), s. 109, Civil Procedure Code., and, coupled with the carefully limited referential words to the Civil Procedure Code in sub-s. (3) suffice, in their Lordships' judgment, to exclude from any right of appeal cases which fall within the requirements of s. 110 of the Code and are operative to confine that right to cases which are certified to be otherwise fit for appeal to His Majesty in Council. It was conceded in argument that if sub-s. (2) of the section had stood alone, it would be difficult to escape from the construction of it which has just been indicated. It was contended, however, that the reference to the Code in sub-s. (3) was made in terms sufficiently comprehensive to include within the class of appealable cases all that are defined in the provisions incorporated by reference. Their Lordships cannot agree with this contention. The words of qualification, "so far as may be," in sub-s. (3) are, in their judgment, apt to confine the statutory right of appeal to the cases described in sub-s. (2). To this extent, therefore, their Lordships are in agreement with the High Court.

But a further point remains. Is there under this section any appeal at all from an order of the High Court made before the Act of 1926 came into force?

The principle which their Lordships must apply in dealing with this matter has been authoritatively enunciated by the Board in Colonial Sugar Refining Co., Ltd. v. Irving (2), where it is in effect laid down that, while provisions of a Statute dealing merely with matters of procedure may properly, unless that construction be textually inadmissible, have retrospective effect attributed to them, provisions which touch a right in existence at the passing of the Statute are not to be applied retrospectively in the absence of express enactment or necessary intendment. Their Lordships can have no doubt that provisions which, if applied retrospectively, would deprive of their existing finality orders, which, when the Statute came into force, were final, are provisions which touch existing rights. Accordingly, if the section now in question is to apply to orders final at the date when it came into force, it must be clearly so provided. Their Lordships cannot find in the section even an indication to that effect.

On the contrary, they think there is a clear suggestion that a judgment of the High Court referred to in sub-s. (2) is one which under sub-s. (1) has been pronounced by "not less than two Judges of the High Court," a condition which was not itself operative until the entire section came into force. In their Lordships' judgment, therefore, the petitioners in these cases have no statutory right of appeal to His Majesty in Council. Only by an exercise of the prerogative is either appeal admissible.

Both petitions their Lordships have, from this point of view, carefully considered. They have not forgotten that the circumstances are somewhat special: that the right of appeal introduced by the Act of 1926 is very probably conceded in order to rectify an omission inadvertently made from previous legislation, and is not one thought of for the first time. Even so, however, their Lordships are unable to find in the circumstances of either case sufficient ground for any exercise of the prerogative in favour of the petitioners.

Their Lordships will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that both petitions should be dismissed with costs.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 58 (c)—Mortgage by conditional sale—Construction—Apparent sale-deed with proviso for redemption whenever executant pays, effect of—Time for payment, whether essential to constitute mortgage by conditional sale—Expressions 'such payment' and 'on a certain date' in s. 58 (c), scope of.

A document which was for the greater part of its length an out-and-out sale-deed, contained a proviso at the end "provided that whenever the first individual among us pays to you the sum of Rs. 500 which is the sale price mentioned herein, you should receive it then, execute duly a sale-deed on a stamp-paper with regard to these lands in favour of the individual No. 1, get it registered, give possession of the lands, etc., and return all the documents relating hereto."

Held, that the document was clearly an ostensible sale with a condition that on payment being made, the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller and was, therefore, a mortgage by conditional sale within s. 58 (c) of the Transfer of Property Act. [p. 162 col. 1; p. 165, col. 2.]

The fixing of a certain date for payment is not an essential feature of a mortgage by conditional sale. [p. 163, col. 1.]

The expression 'such payment' in s. 58 (c), Transfer of Property Act, refers only to the payment of the mortgage amount and the expression 'on a certain date' must be construed as referring to the default and not to the payment. [ibid.]

JUDGMENT.

Srinivasa Aiyangar, J.—My learned brother and myself have recently had quite a number of cases in which the question that arose for determination was the same as in this second appeal, namely, whether on a proper construction of certain documents read in the light of surrounding circumstances the transaction between the parties should be held to be a mortgage by conditional sale or merely a sale with an agreement to re-sell. We may observe with regret in passing that in spite of the differences and variety of judicial opinion with regard to such cases, the Legislature, which is clearly in a position to set at rest such questions being raised, has not yet thought fit to do so. Though the question that has arisen in this case is the same as in several other cases, there is at least one distinguishing feature in this case and that is that the transaction has been brought about not as in nearly all other cases by two documents, one of sale and the other an agreement of re-sale, but that the whole of the contract between the parties is contained in one and the same document.

The facts necessary for appreciating the bearing of the questions that arise may be briefly set out. The document in question was executed by the father of the plaintiffs and the 5th defendant in favour of the father of defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4, one Kamakshi Iyer. The property, however, was sometime afterwards sold by defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 to the 1st defendant. The 1st defendant, therefore, is the person at present in possession of the property and claiming title thereto. The suit was for redemption on the ground that the document in question was one that effected a mortgage by conditional sale. The defence set up was that on a proper construction, the transaction was not a mortgage by conditional sale but was merely a sale with an agreement for a re-sale, that the condition for re-sale was not specifically performed and further that the claim for specific performance is barred by the Law of Limitation. Both the lower Courts have found on a construction of the document against the plaintiffs' claim and dismissed their action. Reference may in this connection also be made to an application for amendment of the plaint that was made on behalf of the plaintiffs even in the Court of first instance when probably it was perceived that the chances were little of the plaintiffs succeeding in their contention on the footing of the transaction having been a mortgage by conditional sale. It was sought by that application to amend the plaint by setting up in the alternative the agreement to re-sell and praying on that footing for specific performance of such agreement. The application for amendment was refused not only by the Court of first instance, but, when it was repeated, also by the lower Appellate Court. Curiously enough, Mr. Alladi Krishnaswami Iyer, the learned Vakil for the appellants in this second appeal wished to argue mainly the question of leave to amend the plaint, though he also indicated the other question with regard to the nature of the transaction on a proper construction of the document. If it should have become necessary for us to deal with and dispose of this question of the amendment of the plaint, we might have had a great deal of difficulty in the matter. Without discussing the question whether the amendment was in substance within the scope of the cause of action laid in the plaint or not, it is clear that if such an amendment should be allowed the defendant should be accorded another opportunity of pleading to the amended claim or cause of action and the result would practically be allowing the plaintiff to begin a fresh suit.

de novo. But in the view we have taken of the case on the construction of the document, it seems to us unnecessary to discuss this question with regard to the application for amendment.

It is, no doubt, true that all such questions which have to be solved on a reading of the document, considering the language employed in the light of surrounding circumstances, and so forth, are generally fraught with great difficulty and we have after giving the matter our earnest and serious consideration, come to the conclusion that on a proper construction of the document before us it is a mortgage by conditional sale. We have already adverted to the fact that this is not a case in which the transaction was brought about, as in most cases it is, by two documents either contemporaneous or, though not contemporaneous, as really parts of the same transaction. When parties to a transaction deliberately choose to conclude the transaction and embody it in writing not in one document but in two separate documents, there is always considerable room for the contention that the intention of the parties as disclosed by the fact that they required two documents to embody the transaction is indicated to be that they wished the sale and the re-sale to be separate legal transactions. Such consideration, however, is not available in the present case, because the parties have deliberately put in all the terms of the contract in the same document. It is unfortunate that there has been no satisfactory evidence of the surrounding circumstances, including the value of the property at the time of the transaction, which might be looked at for the purpose of helping the Court in coming to a conclusion as to the real intention of the parties as disclosed in the language employed. We, therefore, begin this case with the fact that the parties really regarded it as not only a single transaction but as one that was fit and proper to be concluded by the instrument. The clause relating to the agreement for re-sale comes after the clauses effecting the conveyance and that clause begins with the tamil word (Anal). The expression (Anal) clearly indicates that what follows is or should be regarded as a detraction or subtraction from the absoluteness of the sale previously in the document stated to have been made and effected. It may in this connection be noticed that in form and apart from any personal covenants to pay a mortgage by conditional sale is effected in all well-established English precedents of conveyancing first by what is purported to be an absolute conveyance of the property with a habendum that the purchasers should have and hold the premises absolutely for himself and his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, subject, however, to the equity of redemption. The clause relating to the equity of redemption always begins with some such expression as 'provided, however, that' or 'provided always'. Now in the tamil language in which this document is drawn up it is impossible to conceive of a word more apt for the purpose of conveying the connotation and significance of a proviso of that character than the word (Anal). No doubt, it might at first sight shock certain susceptibilities that the decision of such question should be made to depend upon the use of a single word like that. But after all the expression itself must be regarded as clearly indicating the intention and meaning of the parties, and if they did not contemplate by the use of that word to delimit in some manner the absoluteness of the sale therein before in the document stated to have been effected, there is no purpose in the use of the word. The whole of the document must be regarded in construing documents and no single word should be left out of consideration. Giving, therefore, its true and proper weight to the expression, the only conclusion that is possible to arrive at is that the estate granted by the previous clause, namely, an absolute sale, is qualified by the conditions or provisos in this clause. The result then is that this tamil document has somehow or other come to be framed and worded exactly in the same manner as a document of mortgage by conditional sale in English precedents of conveyancing. I shall later on have occasion to refer to the definition in the Transfer of Property Act of a mortgage by conditional sale with special reference to this document, and also deal with the contention of Mr. B. Somayya for the respondents with regard thereto.

The next point to be considered in determining the question whether it was a mortgage or an absolute sale, is the fact that in the document the consideration for the re-sale is stated to be the same amount that is specified as the sale price in the document. If the sale and the re-sale should be two different legal transactions, the consideration for the re-sale is not the amount originally advanced on the sale but some amount which the parties agree to as the consideration for the re-sale. But when the document states that what has to be re-paid is not the consideration agreed to for the re-sale but the amount originally advanced on the sale, the reference to such amount makes the transaction more consistent with its being a mortgage than an agreement of re-sale. There is in this document one other somewhat curious provision and that is as follows:—"This sum you should pay to the said A. Subba Chettiar out of the same amount, get the payments endorsed on the bonds, get them back with his signature and keep them in support of the sale-deed." The direction and the requirement that the purchaser under this document should obtain these debt-bonds with an endorsement of discharge on them and that he should further keep them with him as vouchers in support of the sale-deed would seem rather to indicate that what was intended by the parties was not an outright sale but only a security and the language employed is certainly more consistent with a mortgagee paying the amount of the mortgage for the purpose of discharging the debts of the mortgagor and being required to retain them as vouchers in his hands. If it was an outright sale, it seems difficult to understand why the transferor should have required that the transferee should obtain those bonds and keep them in support of the deed. Reference may also be made to another provision in the document providing for the return of all the connected documents on payment of the money. That clause is also calculated to throw some light on the true meaning and the intention of the parties and is certainly more consistent with the transaction being a mortgage than any other. There is, however, one other and, to my mind, a very conclusive indication in the document that what the parties really intended must have been only a mortgage and not a re-sale. Though the Law Reports are full of cases of this kind and we have had also occasion to come across numerous documents of this nature, still in a proper agreement of re-sale we have not come across a single case in which there was not some time fixed on or before which date it was required that the other party should complete the transaction. The provision in this case is as follows:—"But whenever the first individual among us pays you the sum of Rs. 500 which is the sale price mentioned herein, you should receive it then, execute duly a sale-deed on stamp paper with regard to these lands in favour of the individual No. 1, give it registered, give possession of the lands, etc., and return all the documents relating thereto." If it was a mortgage, one can easily understand the clause being so worded and leaving it to the option of the mortgagor to pay up the amount at any time and require conveyance of the property. Till that is done, the property is in the possession and enjoyment of the mortgagee in lieu of interest. There is nothing more to be done. But if it should be an outright sale, then according to this clause whenever the other party chose to offer this Rs. 500 the purchaser would be under an obligation to re-convey the property. To begin with, it is difficult to understand that parties to an outright sale should have really contemplated entering into such a contract. It is conceivable that between the date of the sale and the time when the seller or his legal representatives may elect to exercise the option and demand re-conveyance of the property on payment of the money considerable time might have elapsed and the price of the property might have become doubled or trebled. If the conveyance was not regarded merely as security for the money, it would be very strange to suppose that without any regard whatever to the possible and probable changes in the price of property the parties agreed to grant a re-sale and effect re-conveyance whenever the other party might wish to demand the same. This provision, therefore, which fixes no time whatever for the purpose of the re-sale seems to me almost conclusive on the question now under consideration. For all these reasons and others which it is unnecessary to refer to in detail I have come to the conclusion that on a proper construction of the language employed in Ex. A the transaction embodied in Ex. A was really a mortgage by conditional sale.

Mr. Somayya for the respondents strenuously contended that even if we should on a construction of the document itself come to the conclusion that it was a mortgage by conditional sale, it was not a valid mortgage having regard to the definition of a mortgage by conditional sale as set out in the Transfer of Property Act, Section 58 of the Transfer of Property Act at first defines a mortgage and then proceeds in the other clauses to define what a simple mortgage is.

what a mortgage by conditional sale is, and so on. A mortgage is defined as "the transfer of an interest in specific immoveable property for the purpose of securing the payment of money advanced or to be advanced by way of loan, an existing or future debt, or the performance of an engagement which may give rise to a pecuniary liability." Therefore with regard to this definition the essential element in a mortgage is the transfer of property by way of security, and that is the question we have been considering with reference to the language employed, and that has already been dealt with. The definition of a mortgage by conditional sale, however, is contained in cl. (c) and is as follows:—"Where the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgaged property on condition that on default of payment of the mortgage-money on a certain date, the sale shall become absolute, or on condition that on such payment being made the sale shall become void or on condition that on such payment being made the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller, the transaction is called a mortgage by conditional sale and the mortgagee a mortgagee by conditional sale." Taking the terms as they are, the necessary element in a mortgage by conditional sale is that there should be an ostensible sale of the mortgaged property. We have it here. Then having reference to the third sub-clause in this clause which is the sub-clause which applies to this case, there should be a condition that 'on such payment being made, the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller.' Here undoubtedly there is a condition, and it is truly a condition because it is introduced by the word (Anal). There is the condition that on payment being made, the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller. Now what Mr. Somayya contended was that the expression 'on such payment' in this sub-clause must be read as referring to the payment referred to in the first sub-clause and on such reference must be construed as a payment of the mortgage-money on a certain date. The first sub-clause, no doubt, refers to the condition being that on default of payment of the money on a certain date the sale shall become absolute. It will be convenient, before referring to or dealing with the cases cited by Mr. Somayya in support of his contention, to examine this contention on its own merits. The contention comes to this, that there can be no mortgage by conditional sale at all, unless, whichever may be the sub-clause there is a certain date fixed as the date on which the payment of the mortgage-money should be made. The expression 'on a certain date' should be taken in terms as merely pointing to the certain date as the date on which the payment should be made, not any date either before or after and no doubt Mr. Somayya had, as Holmwood, J., in a case which I shall presently refer to, when pressed, by this consideration, was forced, to construe the expression 'on a certain date' as meaning 'on or before a certain date.' What warrant is there in the language of the Statute for importing words into it which are not there and construing it in the manner suggested, I really fail to see. It is the reductio ad absurdum to which a reading of the Statute in that manner leads that has induced Mr. Somayya to contend for the construction, that 'on a certain date' should be taken to mean 'on or before a certain date.' It seems to me that such a construction of the clear terms of the section cannot possibly be accepted. Now going back to the first sub-clause in cl. (c), what the clause speaks of is, 'on default of payment of the mortgage-money on a certain date.' No doubt, grammatically 'a certain date' may be related either to the payment or to the default and, having regard perhaps to the genius of the English language, either grammatical construction may possibly be accepted. But if we take it to mean that the condition that should happen on a certain date is not the payment but default in payment, then it is clear that if payment of the mortgage-money should come to be made on or before the date fixed there is no default on the certain date which has been fixed and the absurd result which was sought to be avoided by practically importing into the Statute words which were not there is steered clear of. Further, if the Legislature intended to attach to the expression 'such payment' the requisite, namely, that the payment should be on or before a certain date, it is likely that much clearer terms would have been employed to indicate it. It may also be observed that if the contention put forward by Mr. Somayya with regard to the construction of the expression 'such payment' should be accepted, it follows that most documents which have been regarded and adjudicated by Courts of Law to be proper deeds of conditional mortgage could not be so regarded at all or could not have been properly so adjudged. The expression 'such payment' clearly refers only to the payment of the mortgage amount and if the expression 'on a certain date' is construed as referring to the default and not to the payment there is no difficulty whatever in construing the section or any of the clauses there.

Mr. Somayya, however, has been able by his industry to produce before us two decisions of the Calcutta High Court in which the view contended for by him has found considerable support. The first case cited by him was Kinuram Mondol v. Nitye Chand Sirdar (1). In his judgment in that case no doubt Maclean, C. J., says this: "It is not necessary to decide it finally, but I do not think there was any 'certain date' of payment within the meaning of sub-s. (c) of s. 58 of the Transfer of Property Act, and that is an essential element of a mortgage by conditional sale." This observation was not necessary for the decision of the case and must be regarded merely as an obiter dictum. No doubt, in that sentence the learned Chief Justice considers that the provision with regard to the certain date must be taken to be present not only in the sub-clause where the words occur but also in the other sub-clauses by the use of the expression 'such payment.' For the reasons already given it seems difficult to accept this expression of opinion of the learned Chief Justice in the case. In a later case Mahomed Mozaffer Ali v. Asraf Ali (2) Holmwood and Chapman, J.J., held that a certain date of payment within the meaning of sub-s. (c) of s. 58 of the Transfer of Property Act is an essential element of a mortgage by conditional sale. Then the learned Judges go on to observe as follows regarding the Calcutta case already cited: "The Chief Justice says in that case that in the particular case before the Court he did not think that there was any certain date of payment within the meaning of the section, but he does not lay down that 'on a certain date' means that the tender cannot be made before that date. The certain date which is laid down must according to all rules of interpretation be the last date and it would be both inequitable and impossible to hold that in this country of long distances and poor means of communication a man must go travelling all over the country on the particular day on the chance of finding his creditor and tendering the money to him, and that he could not go on any previous day." The difficulty, nay the absurdity, of construing the expression 'on a certain date' according to the language employed was really felt by the learned Judges and that seems to be the reason why they were at pains to explain it away by stating that according to all rules of interpretation 'on a certain date' means 'on or before a certain date.' But apparently it was overlooked by the learned Judges that if the first sub-clause in that sub-section should be construed as referring 'the certain date' not to the payment but to the default, the whole of this difficulty which they were obsessed with might be avoided altogether. Thus it is clear that there is nothing in the terms of this mortgage which has the effect of not bringing it under the terms of a conditional mortgage as defined by s. 58 of the Transfer of Property Act.

If on a proper construction the transaction was a mortgage no other question really arises.

Mr. Somayya, no doubt, took the alternative case of the clause being regarded as a mere agreement to re-sell the property and launched on a learned disquisition with regard to such a clause offending against the rule against perpetuity. But in the view we have taken that the transaction was a mortgage, no question at all arises because the rule against perpetuity can apply only to cases where there is a new interest in immoveable property contemplated to be created after the expiry of the time prescribed by the rule, namely, the lifetime of a person living and the minority of one who may be in existence then. In the case of a mortgage, however, there is no such future interest in property contemplated to be created because it is of the very essence of the mortgage that the equity of redemption is a present interest in property in exercise of which alone the property is sought to be redeemed. There is also no question of the clause being regarded as a mere personal contract and for that reason held to be invalid, as also of its being void for remoteness. No question arises in this case on the plaint as laid and on the cases of any personal covenant and the enforcement thereof. It seems to me, therefore, unnecessary to discuss the cases, both English and Indian, that have been cited by Mr. Somayya for this purpose. He has frankly conceded that if the correct view should be that it is a mortgage, no such question can possibly arise.

(1) 6 C. L. J. 208; 11 C. W. N. 400.

Both the lower Courts, therefore, were wrong in the view taken by them of Ex. A. I have come to the conclusion that on a proper construction it is a deed of mortgage by conditional sale and that the plaintiffs as the mortgagors are entitled to redeem the property within the time prescribed by the Law of Limitation, namely, sixty years from the date on which they are entitled to redeem. In this case the clause is, 'whenever the party likes he has the right to redeem' and, therefore, the right to redeem accrued to him from the very date of the execution of the mortgage because there is no other term fixed within which the mortgagor is prevented from claiming redemption. No question of limitation, therefore, can possibly arise. The appeal is allowed and the decrees of both the lower Courts are set aside. Instead there will be an ordinary preliminary decree for redemption by the plaintiffs of the suit property. But the case, however, cannot be finally disposed of here because Mr. Somayya states that issue No. VII in the case which relates to the improvements, if any, made by the defendants in respect of the suit property and their right to claim the same from the plaintiffs would have to be gone into and decided before a final decree for redemption is made. The case will have, therefore, to be sent to the Court of first instance for the determination of that issue both on the facts and on the law. It is stated by the learned Vakil for the appellants that at some stage of this litigation the 1st defendant had given a statement to the effect that he did not wish to let in any evidence with regard to that issue. If the Court of first instance should find that there was any such statement given, effect will be given by the Court to such statement in coming to a conclusion with regard to this issue. The Court of first instance will after determining that issue make a final decree for redemption for the proper amount. Except as to the costs which are awarded to the 1st defendant during the trial in the Court of first instance that he should have the costs up to such stage irrespective of the result of the suit, the appellant will be entitled to all the other costs in all the Courts from the 1st defendant. The costs hereafter to be incurred will be provided for by the Court of first instance. The Court-fee paid by the appellants in this Court will be refunded to them.

Reilly, J.—I agree that on the face of Ex. A the transaction represented by it was a mortgage by conditional sale. Here we have a document which for the greater part of its length is an out-and-out sale-deed, and then at the end comes a provision "Anal (provided that) whenever the first individual among us pays to you the sum of Rs. 500 which is the sale price mentioned herein, you should receive it then, execute duly a sale-deed on a stamp-paper with regard to these lands in favour of the individual No. 1, give it registered, give possession of the lands, etc., and return all the documents relating hereto." That, in the language of s. 58 (c) of the Transfer of Property Act, appears to me to be clearly an ostensible sale on condition that on payment being made the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller. But Mr. Somayya has contended that there can be no valid mortgage here because no date for payment has been fixed. There is nothing in the idea of a mortgage generally which makes the fixing of a date for payment or a date before which there can be no redemption essential. In usufructuary mortgages it is not unusual that no time for payment should be fixed; and I believe that in equitable mortgages by deposit of title-deeds it is generally the case that no time for payment is fixed. And s. 60 of the Transfer of Property Act itself recognises that no fixed time for payment is an essential characteristic of a mortgage. But Mr. Somayya has contended that a mortgage by conditional sale is one of the kinds of mortgage for which a fixed time for payment is essential, and he bases that contention primarily on the wording of s. 58 (c). In s. 58 (c) three conditions are set out which when attached to an ostensible sale make the transaction a mortgage by conditional sale. In sub-cl. (1) which deals with the first condition, we find the words "payment of the mortgage money on a certain date." In sub-cl. (2) and (3) we find only the words "such payment". Mr. Somayya contends that we must read the words 'such payment' in sub-cl. (2) and (3) as equivalent to 'payment of the mortgage money on a certain date,' the words used in sub-cl. (1). Grammatically, in my opinion, the words 'such payment' in sub-cl. (2) and (3) refer to the payment of the mortgage-money in sub-cl. (1) without the addition of the words 'on a certain date'. 'Such' means 'of the like kind'; but in Statutes the word is often used as equivalent to 'of that kind' or even loosely as equivalent to 'that'. If we take it that in sub-cl. (2) and (3) 'such payment' means 'payment of that kind' or even 'that payment', we shall be giving full meaning to the expression by reading it as equivalent to 'payment of the mortgage-money' without bringing in the additional words 'on a certain date', which convey an additional idea not really connected with 'payment of that kind'. But, even if it were possible to read the words 'such payment' in sub-cl. (2) and (3) in two alternative senses, either as equivalent to 'payment of the mortgage-money on a certain date or to payment of the mortgage-money alone, I think we should be bound to adopt the latter construction. We are considering a condition set out in a Statute, and we must be careful not to widen the scope of that condition further than the words compel us to go. If two interpretations are possible, we ought to accept the less onerous one. And, if we look at the sense of these sub clauses, it is clear that in sub-cl. (1) the words 'on a certain date' are necessary to the meaning. That is a default clause, and for the purpose of a default clause it is necessary that a date should be fixed or fixable, as otherwise no one will know when the default has occurred. But there is no such necessity in the meaning of sub-cl. (2) and (3) to mention any date. On the mere interpretation of s. 58 (c) as it stands, speaking for myself I should think it is clear that we have no right to introduce into sub-cl. (2) and (3) the words 'on a certain date'. Mr. Somayya has drawn our attention to Kinuram Mandol v. Nitye Chand Sirdar (1) in which Maclean, C. J., clearly stated that a certain date was an essential feature of a mortgage by conditional sale. But that was only an obiter dictum, and there is no discussion of the matter in the judgment. In Mahomed Mozaffer Ali v. Asraf Ali (2) two learned Judges of the same Court assumed that that dictum was correct. But again they did not discuss it, though they used it as the basis of their discussion on a further point. With great respect, I do not think that we can take either of those cases as an authority for the position that the fixing of a certain date for payment is an essential feature of a mortgage by conditional sale.

Mr. Somayya spent a good deal of time in his argument on a contention that anyhow the proviso to Ex. A offended against the rule against perpetuities, or more specifically against the provisions of s. 14 of the Transfer of Property Act. I certainly understood him to be using that contention as an attack upon the theory that Ex. A represented a mortgage by conditional sale; and, if that was not his intention at the time, I hardly think he was justified in occupying us for so long on the point at that stage of the case. However, eventually he has admitted that, if Ex. A represents a mortgage by conditional sale, then the proviso does not offend against the provisions of s. 14 of the Transfer of Property Act. And it is clear that that is so. The proviso does not create any interest after a life or at any future time at all. It merely reserves the right to redeem from the very moment of the document.

I agree that this appeal must be allowed and that the suit should go back to the District Munsif for him to make a decree for redemption subject to the directions indicated by my learned brother.

Fatal Accidents Act (XIII of 1855), s. 1—Damages, assessment of—Elements to be considered—Fine paid to plaintiff in criminal case—Probable duration of life of deceased—Sentimental considerations, whether relevant.

In awarding damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, the Court should take into account the amount of fine realised from the defendant and paid to the plaintiff in criminal proceedings instituted by the latter against the defendant. [p. 166, col. 1.]

In estimating damages under the Act it is settled law that no sentimental considerations are relevant. A plaintiff cannot get higher damages when the deceased had been brutally murdered than where the death had been due to mere error of judgment. [p. 166, cols. 1 & 2.]

In assessing such damages it is necessary to take into account the probable duration of the life of the deceased. [p. 166, col. 2; p. 167, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decree of the Sub-Judge, Agra, dated the 26th January, 1925.

JUDGMENT.

Ashworth, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the widow of a deceased man against the defendant, a zemindar who caused his death by shooting him. The suit is for damages under the Fatal Accidents Act (XIII of 1855). The zemindar was convicted of an offence under s. 304 and sentenced to imprisonment and to a fine of Rs. 1,000. The fine was realised and was paid over to the present plaintiff. Not being satisfied with the amount she has brought this suit and has obtained a decree for the further sum of Rs. 1,500. The defendant appeals. The respondent is not represented. The lower Court awarded the further sum of Rs. 1,500 taking into consideration the fact that Rs. 1,000 had already been awarded.

The first question that arises in this appeal is whether the Rs. 1,000 fine paid over to the plaintiff should be taken into account in the present suit. No authority, one way or the other, has been cited but the Act empowers the Civil Court to give such damages as it may think proportionate to the loss resulting from such death to the party for whom and for whose benefit the action shall be brought.

These words appear to me to require that the fine already realised should be taken into account. The death of the husband was the cause of the fine being realised and given to the plaintiff. Any damages given to the plaintiff by reason of loss must take into account any pecuniary advantage obtained by the plaintiff by reason of the death.

The remaining question is whether the lower Court has over estimated the damages. It is clear and settled by authority that no sentimental considerations are relevant. The plaintiff cannot get higher damages even if her husband was brutally murdered by the defendant than if the death of her husband had been due merely to an error of judgment, such as may, on the part of the driver of a vehicle, cause the death of a person.

The method adopted by the trial Court for assessing the damages is as follows: The sole source of income of the deceased appears to have been the cultivation of an occupancy holding, which he cultivated by his own personal labour. The lower Appellate Court has held that the damages should be assessed according to the sum required to furnish the widow with substituted labour for working the holding. The appellant does not complain as to this method, and the respondent not being present must also be held to acquiesce in this method. What the appellant complains of is that an error has been committed by the lower Court in working out the method. The Court has estimated the monthly expenditure required to furnish the labour for working the holding at from Rs. 10 to Rs. 12 a month and has awarded a sum which, if invested in Government securities, would produce Rs. 10 a month. It is objected that the deceased was 56 years old at the time of his death and would not have been capable of working the holding for more than, at the very utmost, ten years. This appears to me to be a just contention. The sum awarded by the lower Court, however, not only will enable the widow to hire the necessary labour for ten years but will leave her at the end of that time with a sum of Rs. 1,500, which she would not have possessed at the end of ten years if her husband had survived. This objection is, in my opinion, obviously common sense. The principle underlying the objection has been approved by an English decision under Lord Campbell's Act (which is practically the same as the Indian Act). In Rowley v. L. & N. W. Railway (1) it was held that a Jury might estimate the damages to an annuitant of the deceased by calculating what sum would buy him an equally good annuity but it was added that it was material to know the average duration of the life of the annuitant. Similarly, in this case where we know the probable duration of the capacity of the deceased to supply the labour for the occupancy holding we must take that duration into consideration.

I am not disposed to hold that the method employed by the lower Court, if properly applied, was an incorrect method. There is no contention in this appeal before us that it is incorrect. There are no facts clearly set forth in the judgment of the lower Appellate Court which would enable this Court in appeal to assess the damages under any alternative method. It appears, therefore, that we should accept this method but correct the application of it. Rs. 12 a month comes to Rs. 144 per year. Assuming that the deceased might have worked for ten years (an exceedingly favourable estimate to the plaintiff), a total sum of Rs. 1,440 would supply that labour. But this sum would not have to be expended at once. It would only be expended at the rate of Rs. 12 per month. All the ten years the widow would be enjoying interest on the diminishing capital sum. If, therefore, we substitute, for a sum required when invested in Government securities to bring in Rs. 10 per month a capital sum of Rs. 1,440, the decision will err, if at all, in being too generous to the widow. The appellant, however, has not suggested what deduction should be made as a set-off as against this interest, and it is not necessary in a case of this nature to calculate the damages with meticulous accuracy. I am of the opinion that a sum of Rs. 1,500 will be amply sufficient to make the damages proportionate to the loss resulting in the death of the plaintiff's husband, Rs. 1,000 as already stated must be deducted and this will leave a sum of Rs. 500. I would, therefore, vary the finding of the lower Court by reducing the sum of Rs. 1,500 to one of Rs. 500. The parties in both Courts will get proportionate costs according to their success and failure.

Mukerji, J.—I agree.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XL, r. 1—Appointment of Receiver pending suit.

On an application for the appointment of a Receiver pending the suit, the essential point for the Court to consider is whether the plaintiff has shown prima facie that he has a strong case and a good title to the property. [p. 169, col. 1.]

Appeals against the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Tanjore, dated the 23rd December, 1926, in I. A. No. 481 of 1926 in O. S. No. 81 of 1926.

Messrs. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, (Advocate-General), A. Krishnaswami Iyer, E. Vinayaka Rao, T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Appellant.

Messrs. T. Rangachari, B. C. Sankaranarayanan, S. Varadachari, A. Srirangachariar and K. Narasimha Iyengar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals are against the order of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore in the matter of appointment of a Receiver in O. S. No. 81 of 1926 on his file. That suit was filed by the plaintiff to declare that he is the reversionary heir of the Kapistalam Estate. The last male owner was one Chandrapakasa Moopanar who died in 1869 leaving a widow who died in 1884. On her death their daughter Seethalakshmi Ammal succeeded. She died on 9th March, 1926. Her husband Krishnaswami Moopanar died on 29th April, 1926. On Seethalakshmi Ammal's death there were three sets of claimants, first the plaintiff who claims as the son of Seethalakshmi Ammal's daughter, second the 1st defendant, who claims as the adopted son of Seethalakshmi Ammal's husband and third, defendants Nos. 2 to 5 who claim as dayadies of the last male owner. Defendant No. 1 and defendants Nos. 2 to 5 have compromised between themselves and now present a united front to the plaintiff who is suing for a declaration.

of his title and for possession of so much of the estate as is not now in his possession.

While Seethalakshmi Ammal was alive, the estate was being managed, latterly at least, by a power-of-attorney agent, who is the 6th defendant, and was largely in the actual possession of lessees, the periods of, whose leases have yet a considerable time to run. Thus the plaintiff is holding a lease, Ex. E, dated 23rd September, 1925, of 50 or 60 velies in Satyamangalam village, current for 9 years and the 2nd defendant holds a lease, Ex. VII, dated 14th October, 1922, of 170 or 180 velies, current for 10 years. Under Ex. A a document dated 4th February, 1926, the 2nd defendant is prima facie entitled to the rents of practically the whole estate. This Ex. A was given by the power-of-attorney agent while Seethalakshmi Ammal was still alive, and it must for purposes of these appeals be accepted as made under authority and, therefore, valid. Criticism such as the Subordinate Judge makes on its terms appears to us here beside the point.

The plaintiff applied to the lower Court for the appointment of a Receiver to take over the management and collection of rents of the estate, to look after the charities, to lease out the properties on proper rents, to recover moveables secreted by the defendants and prevent waste and injury. The lower Court, after an elaborate enquiry has in a lengthy order directed the appointment of a Receiver who shall take over the management of the estate, collect rents from the lessees, take possession of such of the estate as is not in possession of lessees, conduct charities and preserve the property. Against this order the defendants have come up in appeal.

We are of opinion that the lower Court has not viewed the matter from the right point of view. The essential point for it to consider was whether the plaintiff has shown prima facie that he has a strong case and a good title to the property. Instead of considering this it puts that altogether aside with the remark that the plaintiff's title is a matter for decision in the suit. Such a comment might be made in every application for a Receiver, and if, endorsed would render the appointment of a Receiver, almost automatic. On the other hand, the learned Judge discusses the strength and the weakness of the 1st defendant's case but refuses to discuss the case of defendants Nos. 2 to 5, and nevertheless finally concludes (para. 21) that "this is not a case where it can be said at this stage and on the present materials that any party has established a clear and strong prima facie title which is beyond dispute." Such being his conclusion, namely, that the plaintiff has not established a clear and strong prima facie title, the correct order for him was to refuse his application. But, influenced by what he regards as sinister conduct on the part of defendants Nos. 2 and 6 with reference to Ex. A and the idea that there has been a scramble for possession after the death of the lady, the learned Judge has seen fit to appoint a Receiver. It did not appear in the course of arguments before us that the possession of any lessee has been disturbed. What has been the subject of scramble, if the word may be used, was the right to collect the rents from the lessees. No one is at present threatening to oust the plaintiff from his leasehold of 50 velies, and that is the whole extent to which, assuming him to be the reversionary heir, he is entitled to present possession. As regards the scramble for the right to collect the rents, as the defendant-claimants have settled their differences and are in possession of a major portion of the estate, the only scramble is by the plaintiff, and the question which the lower Court should have addressed itself to was, as we have said, has the plaintiff such a strong prima facie case that the Court was justified in directing that the existing state of things at the death of the lady should be interfered with?

The plaintiff can succeed only if he is able to defeat both sets of defendants. He must first of all establish that there was no adoption of the 1st defendant or that that adoption was under such conditions that 1st defendant does not succeed to the Kapistalam Estate, and secondly that defendants Nos. 2 to 5 are not dayadies of the last male owner, or that, if they are, he, as daughter's daughter's son of the last male owner, has by force of some special custom a title to preference over them. Prima facie the facts are at present against him. As to the first point 1st defendant's adoption has been held good in a suit by him against Seethalakshmi Ammal both in the original Court and on appeal: see Exs. I (a) and I (b). If there are any circumstances connected with the adoption which would preclude the 1st defendant from succeeding to Seethalakshmi Ammal these have still to be proved. As to the second point the early documents, not so far discredited—see Ex. XIV of the year 1831, which the Judge wrongly ascribes to the year 1868, Ex. XV of 1868 and Ex. XVII, a judgment of the High Court indicate that the genealogy put forward by these defendants is correct, and its incorrectness has still to be proved by the plaintiff. Plaintiff has so far produced no document to negative the correctness of this genealogy.

He has also waited a very considerable time before making his move. The suit was filed on 9th September, 1926, six months after the death of Seethalakshmi Ammal. In the interval there were curator proceedings in the District Court in which the plaintiff took no open part and certainly did not there press openly any claim on the estate. That petition was disposed of on 30th March, 1926. The present contention of a special custom was not put forward in any shape or form in the curator proceedings and only appears for the first time in his present plaint. He has still to go the whole way in proof of his case and prima facie at present it does not appear to be a strong one. We are clear in these circumstances that the lower Court was not justified in appointing a Receiver at the present stage. If subsequently the plaintiff makes out a strong case or the defendants fall out amongst themselves, it may be necessary to re-consider the matter. We reverse the order of the lower Court and dismiss the plaintiff's petition with costs to the defendants in both Courts. Appellants in each appeal will have their costs here from plaintiff.

RESPONDENT.

Agency Rules (Vizagapatam), r. 55—Appeal against order refusing to set aside dismissal of suit for default, whether lies—Improper exercise of discretion—Power of agent to act under r. 55.

Though the Vizagapatam Agency Rules do not provide for an appeal from an order refusing to set aside an order dismissing a suit for default, the agent has power under s. 55 of the Agency Rules, to set aside an order of a special assistant refusing to set aside the dismissal of a suit for default, where the latter has not exercised a judicial discretion in the matter.

Petition, under s. 115 of Act V of 1908 and s. 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Agent to the Governor, Vizagapatam, dated the 23rd December, 1925, in O. M. P. No. 25 of 1925 (Application under r. 55 of the Agency Rules against the order of the Court of the Special Assistant Agent, Koraput Division, dated the 21st April, 1925, in O. S. No. 22 of 1922.)

Mr. P. Somasundaram, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Y. Suryanarayana, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner seeks to revise an order passed by the Agent to the Governor at Vizagapatam setting aside the dismissal of a suit for default and ordering its restoration to file. It is here contended that the power under Agency Rule 55 given to the Agent to the Governor can only be exercised if he is satisfied that the order of the lower Court is not according to law. It is significant that the Agency Rules do not provide for any appeal against an order refusing to set aside a dismissal. Therefore, the exercise of discretion by the first Court becomes final and is not subject to alteration by the Appellate Court. If the Agent to the Governor was satisfied that this discretion had not been properly exercised by the first Court he would be justified in acting under r. 55. In the present case, on the merits, his order is certainly right for I am of opinion that the Special Assistant Agent omitted to take into consideration many circumstances which might probably would have induced him to re-consider his order. If, therefore, the Governor's Agent thought that the Assistant Agent had not exercised his discretion judicially, as he evidently did, he was justified in taking action under r. 55.

The petition is dismissed with costs.

C. P. Land Revenue Act (II of 1917), ss. 151, 152—Pre-emption, claim to, enforceability of, in execution proceedings.

Sitaram v. Kaniram (1), overruled.

Revision against an order of the Sub-Judge, First Class, Ohanda, dated the 16th April, 1926, in Execution Case No. 7 of 1924.

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

Hallifax, A. J. C.—(November 13, 1926).

—The applicants for revision are recorded co-sharers in the village of Bormala and Saotala in the Ohanda District. They say their share is four annas in each village, but even if that was so they have lost five pies out of each four annas by the proceedings in this case, and each share now is three annas seven pies only. All that matters in this case, however, is that they still have a share in each village; with the extent of the share we are not concerned.

The opposite party in these proceedings held a decree against the owners of the whole of the rest of both villages and attached a twelve annas five pies share in each village, in execution of it. These shares were put to auction on the 26th of March, 1926, and knocked down for Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 500 to the decree-holders, who had the permission of the Court to bid. The date fixed for the confirmation of the sale was the 19th of June, the long adjournment being due to the vacation intervening. On the 12th of April, the present applicants for revision put in a petition claiming, under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act, 1917, to take both shares at the sums last bid.

The learned Judge of the lower Court followed the ruling in Sitaram v. Kaniram (1) as he was bound to do, and rejected the petition on the 16th of April. With most unusual promptitude, the petitioners applied to this Court on the 29th of the same month for revision of that order. That saves them from being barred from getting revision by the consideration mentioned at the end of the judgment cited, that an appeal would lie from the order confirming the sale, as that order was not passed till the 19th of June. It is also open to question whether an appeal by them would lie against the order confirming the sale, as they were not interested in it except as claimants of a right of pre-emption.

The effect of the judgment in Sitaram v. Kaniram (1) is this. A Collector acting in execution of a decree, with the powers granted to him under s. 68 of the Civil Procedure Code, could in those execution proceedings enquire into a claim to pre-emption made under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act, 1917, and could grant it, but in doing so he was acting as a Revenue Officer. A Civil Court, as such, never had that power, and as it ceased to exist in the Collector in April, 1923, there is no way of enforcing that right now except by suit; it cannot be enforced in execution proceedings.

It can hardly be correct to say that a Collector acting under the rules in Sch. III or any part of the Civil Procedure Code was acting as a Revenue Officer, and that when the powers he held were taken from him they ceased to exist. The powers he held were those of a Civil Court, which were transferred to him, and when they were taken from him they reverted to the Civil Court.

But anyhow it was always the Civil Court itself which dealt with an application under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act, even before April, 1923. The powers conferred on the Collector by the Local Government were only those which the Civil Court had "in execution of the decree", and under cl. (b) of s. 70 (1) of the Civil Procedure Code no wider powers could be conferred on him. The Collector had no power to enquire into objections to the execution or claims to the property, and a claim such as one under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act was made to the Civil Court itself, which disposed of it. It would probably be presented in the first place to the Collector, but he could do nothing with it but forward it to the Civil Court which would deal with it, the execution proceedings being transferred back from the Collector till it was decided.

There is no necessity to translate s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act from its surroundings to make it applicable to a Civil Court, because it has always been so applicable, but I can see no difficulty in doing so if it were necessary. Nor is there anything to prevent an Act of the Imperial Legislature being modified by a local Act; instances of this being done directly are common.

With all due respect, I am of opinion, that the application made to the Executing Court in this case ought to have been accepted by that Court and granted, unless any reason to the contrary appeared, and none has ever been alleged. Accordingly I refer to a Bench the question whether the decision in Sitaram v. Kaniram (1) is correct or not.

Messrs. Atmaram Bhagwant and S. A. Ghadgay, for the Applicants.

Messrs. A. V. Khare and W. B. Pendhar-kar, for the Non-Applicants.

OPINION.—In the officially published judgment of this Court in Sitaram v. Kaniram (1) it was held that the right of pre-emption created by s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act, 1917, could not be enforced by a Civil Court in the execution of a decree; it could be enforced only by a Collector exercising powers conferred on him under s. 70 of the Civil Procedure Code, and as there are now no such Collectors that can no longer be done; the claimant must file a regular suit. The correctness of this decision has been doubted in three cases, of which this is one, and they have come before a Full Bench.

From that view we feel bound, with all respect, to dissent. It seems mainly based on a misconception of the position of a Collector in the execution of a decree. In such a proceeding he did not act as a Revenue Officer but as a Judge of a Civil Court to which execution of the decree had been transferred, and any powers he had were the powers of the Civil Court primarily executing the decree, which were delegated to him. They could not be delegated unless the Civil Court had them, and now that they are not delegated they still remain in the Civil Court and are not extinguished.

But, as a matter of fact, the particular power in question here was never delegated at all; it remained all the time in the Civil Court which transferred the decree to the Civil Court of the Collector. It was always the Civil Court itself which dealt with an application under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act, even before April, 1923. The powers conferred on the Collector by the Local Government were only those which the Civil Court had "in execution of the decree", and under cl. (b) of s. 70 (1) of the Civil Procedure Code no wider powers could be conferred on him.

The Collector, therefore, had no power to enquire into objections to the execution or claims to the property, and a claim such as one under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act was made to the Civil Court itself, which disposed of it. It would probably be presented in the first place to the Collector, but he could do nothing with it but forward it to the Civil Court, which would deal with it, the execution proceedings being transferred back from the Collector till it was decided.

The learned Judicial Commissioner was unable to hold that "the provision under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act can, so to speak, be translated from its surroundings and made automatically applicable to a Civil Court executing a decree under the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code." It is true that Chap. X of the Land Revenue Act, 1917, is headed 'Collection of Land Revenue' and the provisions contained in that Chapter except the one under consideration dealt with matters connected with recovery of land revenue. But this provision refers in specific terms to the execution of a decree of a Civil Court, a matter which has nothing to do with the collection of land revenue. It was as foreign to its surroundings when a Collector acting as a Judge of a Civil Court possessed certain powers relating to the execution of a decree as it is at present.

The learned Judge's own difficulty in this matter seems to have arisen out of the view that "so to hold would be, in effect, to allow an Act of the Imperial Legislature like the Civil Procedure Code to be modified by a local Act like the C. P. Land Revenue Act of 1917." This at one stage of the present case was regarded as raising "an important question of constitutional law." The question is answered by the preamble to the Land Revenue Act, 1917, and sub ss (2) and (5) of s. 79 of the Government of India Act, 1915.

As this is an application in revision it is necessary to mention also the additional reason stated at the end of the judgment under consideration for rejecting the similar application in that case. It is that an appeal would lie against the order confirming the sale and, therefore, no application for revision could be entertained. An appeal would certainly lie against an order of confirmation, but not by a claimant of pre-emption under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act.

There are further matters which make the enforcement of such a claim by a separate suit practically impossible. Section 151 provides that the claim is to be made before the sale is confirmed and the claimant must undertake to fulfil all the conditions of the sale binding on the purchaser. In the view taken, that would fix a period of limitation for the suit of thirty days from the date of the sale, and the undertaking would have to be made, presumably, in the plaint. Further s. 152, the next following section, says that "if a right of pre-emption is exercised under s. 151, any amount deposited by the original purchaser shall be re-paid to him." That could not be done till after the decision of the separate suit, which would be long after the sale had been confirmed and the money had been taken out of deposit and given to the decree-holder.

The finding of the Bench is that a claim to pre-empt under s. 151 of the Land Revenue Act is enforceable in execution proceedings, and not by separate suit. With this answer the records will be returned to the Court that made the reference.

JUDGMENT.

Hallifax, A. J. C.—(July 21, 1927).—A Full Bench of the Court has now decided that the claim to pre-emption must be decided in execution proceedings, not in a separate suit. The order confirming the sale is, therefore, set aside, and the claim to pre-empt is allowed. The lower Court will now proceed in accordance with s. 152 of the Land Revenue Act. The applicants' costs in both Courts will be paid by the opposite party. The Pleader's fee in this Court will be one hundred rupees.

An order of a Judge on the Original Side of the High Court granting a review and directing the decree to be amended is appealable under cl. 15 of the Letters Patent. [p. 175, col. 1.]

Although when a review is granted, and the case is re-opened for consideration, it is open to the party aggrieved to appeal against that order only on grounds which fall under O. XLVII, r. 7, Civil Procedure Code, yet when that stage has passed and on re-hearing, a fresh decree is passed and the final decree or order is appealed against, the Court is not confined to the grounds mentioned in r. 7 but has full power to go into the whole case on the merits and see whether on the evidence the decree passed on review is proper. Per Ramesam, J.—An appeal against an order granting a review can be filed only on the grounds mentioned in O. XLVII, r. 7. If an appeal is filed against the final judgment and decree after the review, even then if one of the grounds of appeal is that the order granting the review was an erroneous order, it should be attacked only on the same grounds and no other. But this does not mean that the judgment after review cannot be attacked on the merits, while submitting to the order granting the review. [p. 176, col. 1.]

Appeal against the judgment and order of Mr. Justice Srinivasa Iyengar, dated the 12th November, 1926, and passed in the exercise of the Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction of the High Court, in O. S. No. 860 of 1924.

Mr. Srinivasa Raghavan, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. S. Krishnaswami Iyengar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against an order of the learned Judge on the Original Side granting a review of the judgment and amending the decree. The order appealed against is printed on page 14 of the printed papers. It runs as follows:—

"1. That the said decree dated the 3rd day of February, 1926, be amended by including therein the following clauses, viz.

(a) That the 6th defendant is entitled to provision for residence in house and premises No. 41, Badrian Street.

(b) That the room marked A in red pencil in the plan attached here to and situate between the 1st and the 2nd compartments of the said house be allotted for use of the 6th defendant as a kitchen, eating room, store room, etc., and that the room marked B in the said plan and situate in front adjoining the street verandah be allotted for living, sleeping, etc.

(c) That the 6th defendant be also entitled to the use of the common passages, pipes, lavatory, washing places, etc.

(d) That the 6th defendant shall have no right to let or sub-let the portion allotted to her as aforesaid and that she is allowed to entertain guests or relations in the portion allotted to her so long as he or they do not encroach upon or occupy any other portion of the house.

I mention this in extenso as a preliminary objection has been raised that no appeal lies from this order. It is conceded that the original decree does not contain these provisions. The plaintiff and the 1st defendant are brothers. The 3rd defendant is the step-brother of the 1st defendant. The 6th defendant is the mother of the 3rd defendant and step-mother of the plaintiff and the 1st defendant. The suit was for partition and in the plaint a maintenance of Rs. 35 was offered. Defendants Nos. 1 to 5 filed a joint written statement stating that the maintenance ought to be Rs. 50. The 6th defendant filed a written statement adopting the written statement of defendants Nos. 1 to 5. When the case came on for trial, the parties wanted to compromise. They adjourned to the Chambers of Srinivasa Iyengar, J., and certain terms were discussed and agreed to. There were other terms which had to be arranged and so the matter was adjourned. But in the Chambers of Srinivasa Iyengar, J., all the parties agreed that the 6th defendant should have maintenance at Rs. 60 a month and residence in house and premises No. 41, Badrian Street, some other matters were left over. Ultimately there was a razinama agreement signed by all the parties including the 6th defendant. The razinama petition gave maintenance at Rs. 60 but there was no provision for residence. This petition was explained to the 6th defendant and the other parties by the interpreter of this Court. When the case came on before the Court as some minors were concerned and the consent of the Court was necessary it was mentioned that there was a slight variation in the razinama though the nature of the variation was not stated, and the learned Judge sanctioned the compromise on behalf of the minors and directed a decree to be passed in terms of the razinama. The decree in terms was passed on 3rd February, 1926. On the 30th of April, 1926, an application was made by the 6th defendant to review the compromise decree and to have the decree amended by including therein a provision for the residence of the 6th defendant in house No. 41, Badrian Street, Madras and for staying the 1st defendant from ejecting the 6th defendant and for fixing the portion in which the 6th defendant was to reside. The only affidavit in support of this application was that of the 6th defendant in which after stating that there was a compromise at the time of the hearing of the suit she states that one of the terms was that house and ground No. 41, Badrian Street, Madras, was to be allotted to the share of the 1st defendant at a valuation of Rs. 12,000 and that she should have a right of residence in the said house and that she agreed to the compromise since according to it she was entitled to Rs. 60 a month for maintenance and a right of residence. She then says that when she signed the razinama she took it for granted that all the terms agreed to would naturally have found a place in the razinama and so she readily put her signature to the razinama. Paragraph 6 of the affidavit is as follows:—"I am now informed and believe the same to be true that the provision for my residence in the family house has been either accidentally or designedly omitted in the razinama though my right of residence was particularly mentioned and provided for at the time of the compromise."

She then says that the 1st defendant wants to turn her out of the house in contravention of the terms agreed to. I may state that this is the only affidavit in support of the application and the only evidence when the matter came on for disposal before the Judge on her behalf was her own evidence. The 1st defendant filed a counter-affidavit in which he states that the razinama signed and filed in Court was explained to her and she was informed of the change in the original terms proposed and that she agreed to it and signed the razinama. He denies that any terms were omitted accidentally or designedly. According to the 1st defendant, the matters which were not agreed to in Srinivasa Iyengar's Chambers were subsequently discussed and the 6th defendant said that she was willing to give up her claim to residence if the claim made by any of the parties to the jewels in her possession of the value of Rs. 2,000 were abandoned and this was agreed to by all the parties. The 1st plaintiff filed an affidavit supporting the affidavit of the 1st defendant. When the matter came on for trial, the 6th defendant was examined in support of the application, and on behalf of the 1st defendant the Vakil for the 1st defendant, Mr. Srinivasa Raghavan and the Vakil for the 6th defendant, Mr. Thiagaraja Iyer were both examined. The 6th defendant in her evidence states that she was never informed of any change in the terms first proposed and ultimately omitted in the razinama and that she signed it before the interpreter in ignorance of any such change. She denies that either Mr. Thiagaraja Iyer or Mr. Srinivasa Raghavan informed her of the omission of the right of residence. She admits that the razinama was explained to her in the interpreter's office. She admits that she signed the document in the interpreter's office. The learned Judge does not believe her evidence when she states that she was never informed that there was any change in the razinama. The other two witnesses are Mr. Srinivasa Raghavan and Mr. Thiagaraja Iyer; Mr. Srinivasa Raghavan states in his evidence that he never told her that she had a right of residence in the house and that there were two rooms in which she could live. This is what he says: "I told her, 'The right of residence clause is deleted and if the 1st defendant wants you to go out of the house, you have to go out.' She said 'We have agreed and there is no difficulty.' So I asked Mr. Thiagaraja Iyer to attend to it, because I was busy." Mr. Thiagaraja Iyer who was her Vakil states in his evidence that, before the razinama was taken to Court and explained to her he sent for her in order to satisfy himself whether she had consented to the omission and that she came to his office and said that she had consented. This is what he says as regards what happened in his office:

Q. Did you send for the lady?

A. Yes. On the morning on which this document was executed at 10 o'clock she came to my office.

Q. What did you do?

A. I read to her the razinama and drew her attention to the alteration.

Q. You read the whole of it?

A. Not the whole. I said "You get maintenance at this rate, and the right of residence does not find a place as consented to originally. Do you consent?" She said "Yes." It was on the faith of that—and then, I sent her to the interpreter's office. What happened there I do not know.

The learned Judge who states in his judgment that he accepts every word of Mr. Srinivasa Raghavan and Mr. Thiagaraja Iyer, does not believe the evidence of the 6th defendant when she says that she signed the razinama in ignorance of the fact that the right of residence which was agreed to in Srinivasa Iyengar, J.'s Chambers was deleted. There can be no doubt that the razinama was explained to her by the interpreter. It bears her signature and a certificate of the interpreter that it was read out and explained to her. These are the facts. The learned Judge while disbelieving the truth of the story of the 6th defendant that she signed without knowing that there was an omission and accepting the evidence of both the Vakils who state in the clearest possible terms that the omission was pointed out to her and her attention drawn to it and there is also the fact that one of the Vakils says that he told her that she could be ejected at any time on the razinama as it stood, granted a review of the judgment on the ground that he suspected that the 1st defendant would have induced the 6th defendant to sign the razinama on representing to her that the omission would make no difference as to her rights. In fact the whole of the learned Judge's judgment is based upon suspicion of what he thinks would have happened and not upon evidence which was adduced before him. In more than one place the learned Judge says that there is a strong suspicion that fraud was practised by the 1st defendant on the 6th defendant and she was induced to sign the razinama. We may state at once that there is no evidence that the 1st defendant made any representation to the 6th defendant or that she was misled into signing the razinama by reason of any representation which the 1st defendant made. The 6th defendant does not say a word about it. The 1st defendant in his affidavit denies that the change was not mentioned to her and both the Vakils state clearly—and their evidence is believed—that she was informed of the change. Suspicion, though it may be a ground for scrutiny, cannot form the basis of a decision; and we find it difficult to see how on the evidence it can be said that the 1st defendant fraudulently induced the 6th defendant to sign the razinama without the clause of residence on any representation that it would not matter or affect her right. On the merits there can be little doubt that the amendment could not be granted giving her the right of residence.

Two grounds are taken by Mr. K. S. Krishnaswami Iyengar for the respondent. One is that no appeal would lie from this order of Srinivasa Iyengar, J., amending the decree and that even if an appeal lies the grounds must be confined to the grounds mentioned in O. XLVII, r. 7. I have set out the terms of the order and it is clear that this appeal is not from an order granting review but it is from an order which not only grants a review but also amends the decree; and the order, as it stands which amounts to a decree also is clearly, in my opinion, a judgment under s. 15 of the Letters Patent, whatever the case may be, if review alone had been granted and nothing done so as to affect the original decree and the appeal was only from the order granting the review. If that stage has passed and the case re-heard and the order of the learned Judge amounts to a decree, as in this case, it is impossible to see how such an order allowing an amendment which is a clear and final adjudication on the rights of the parties as regards the right of residence of the 6th defendant, inasmuch as it gives the 6th defendant the right of residence, and to that extent affects the rights of the appellant, is not a judgment within s. 15 of the Letters Patent. I am clearly of opinion that the order appealed against, as it stands, is a judgment satisfying the requirements of cl. 15 of the Letters Patent.

As regards the contention that O. XLVII, r. 7 precludes us from going into the matter and holding that the amendment ought not to be allowed, I think that the moment the review is granted the whole case is re-opened for consideration and where a final decree or order is passed after the review is granted, the final decree or order can be appealed against and in such an appeal what we have to see is whether on the materials before the Court such a decree or order as was ultimately passed could have been passed. All that is done when a review is granted is that the case is re-opened for consideration and it is open to the parties to appeal against that order on grounds which fall under O. XLVII, r. 7. The authorities are that on such an appeal the Court is confined to the grounds set out in r. 7; when that stage has passed and on re-hearing, a fresh decree is passed, the Court, on appeal from the decree or order, has full power to go into the whole case on the merits and see whether on the evidence the decree passed is proper. In this case, it is clear from the proceedings before the learned Judge that the case was adjourned twice after the review was granted and ultimately the decree was modified. The question now is not limited to the propriety of the order granting review so as to confine us to limitations imposed by r. 7. What we have to see is whether the decree which was ultimately passed is correct having regard to the evidence in the case and it is difficult to see how we can on hearing the appeal confine ourselves to considerations based upon O. XLVII, r. 7, and refuse to grant the merits of the appeal against the amended decree. It is open to the plaintiff to attack the decree ultimately passed with reference to the materials before the Court at the time of the amended or revised decree and what the Appellate Court has to see is whether the evidence is sufficient to support the decree or order appealed against. The question, therefore, before us is whether on the materials before the Court, when the Court amended the final decree there were sufficient grounds to alter the compromise decree originally passed in the way in which it has done. There is no question of res judicata. All that was decided on the application for review was that the case was a fit one for reviewing judgment. We are not concerned with the question whether the learned Judge was right in granting the prayer to review judgment on the materials before him. If the appeal is merely an appeal against the order granting review, it is clear that O. XLVII, r. 7 will effectively prevent us from going into the propriety of the order unless the case falls within rr. 2 and 4. What we now have to consider is whether after the case was re-opened there were sufficient materials for amending the decree which was passed by consent. The fact that the Appellate Court cannot interfere with the order granting review does not prevent the Court from considering the appeal from the ultimate decree passed after review on the merits and seeing whether the evidence supports the decree or order passed. I need only refer to Nundo Lal Mullick v. Punchanon Mukherjee (1), Venkata Seetharamayya v. Veena Tulasi Tulasi Babu (2), Oravukundiyl Parkum Slavana Tholan v. Palankundy Kunhi Kutty (3). I do not think Gopala Aiyar v. Ramasami Sastrial (4) lays down a different rule or supports the contention of the respondent's Advocate that if a Judge grants a review on grounds which give no right of appeal any decree he may finally pass cannot be questioned on the merits. The appeal is allowed with costs throughout.

Ramesam, J.—I entirely agree. I do not propose to add to that portion of my learned brother's judgment which deals with the facts of the case. But I wish to add a few words with reference to the technical part of the argument of the learned Counsel for the respondent in this case based on the ground that we cannot consider the validity of the order granting review.

It is true that an appeal against an order granting a review can be filed only on the grounds mentioned in O. XLVII, r. 7. One of the grounds is not that the order was granted without sufficient cause. If a Judge grants a review without sufficient cause, the order cannot be attacked in appeal. [See Gopala Aiyar v. Ramasami Sastrial (4), and the cases referred to therein]. It is also true that, if an appeal is filed against the final judgment and decree after the review, even then if one of the grounds of appeal is that the order granting the review was an erroneous order, it should be attacked only on the same grounds and no other. But this does not mean that the judgment after review cannot be attacked on the merits, while submitting to the order granting the review.

In the present case the appeal is not merely against the order granting the review but against the final judgment and order in the suit. That appeal has to be disposed of on the merits.

Now, what are the merits of this appeal?

A compromise petition was filed by all the parties. There is no term in it relating to the residence of the 6th defendant. The evidence of the two Vakils shows that she agreed to that compromise. The learned Judge has believed their evidence. On these materials there is only one decree that can be passed in the case, namely, one in accordance with the razinama.

Mr. K. S. Krishnaswami Iyengar argues that this conclusion is inconsistent with the grounds on which the review has been granted. It may be so or it may not be so. It is immaterial for the disposal of the suit. All we have got is an order granting a review—an order the correctness of which we are precluded from considering. We start with it. The result of the order is the whole case is re-opened for disposal by the learned Judge and for disposal by us in appeal. We are not and cannot be bound by the finding of the learned Judge in granting the review. There is no section or decision which lays down that such findings are binding on us. We can differ from his findings in disposing of the case on the merits. I agree with my learned brother in holding that the razinama as finally reduced to writing is binding on the 6th defendant, and agree to the order proposed by him.

JUDGMENT.

Campbell, J.—This litigation involves four buildings which may conveniently be termed as A, B, C and D ones the property of Maharaj Narain. On 11th February, 1905, A, B and C were mortgaged to one Mul Chand for Rs. 3,000 and on 25th February, 1907, A, B, C and D were mortgaged to Ishri Parshad for Rs. 6,000 of which Rs. 3,000 was the redemption price of Mul Chand's mortgage.

On 11th February, 1911, Maharaj Narain sold B to Lal Muhammad for Rs. 3,500 out of which Rs. 2,600 were left with the purchaser for payment to Ishri Parshad the mortgagee and the balance Rs. 890 was paid in cash. Lal Muhammad subsequently re-sold B to Ulfat Rai in 1917.

On the same date, 11th February, 1911, Maharaj Narain sold to Lal Muhammad C for Rs. 1,500 (left with purchaser for Ishri Parshad Rs. 790 and cash Rs. 710) and D for Rs. 2,000 the whole of which price was left with the purchaser for payment to Ishri Parshad.

On 21st March, 1911, Maharaj Narain sold A to Joti Parshad for Rs. 3,000 cash.

In 1918, Tej Narain, son of Maharaj Narain brought three suits based on the three sales, for possession in each case of the property sold, on the ground that the property was ancestral Hindu family property and that its alienation was a nullity as regards him. The trial Court has decreed all three suits with the condition that before obtaining possession the plaintiff must pay Rs. 2,000 to Lal Muhammad and Rs. 500 to Joti Parshad. These sums apparently represent the estimated value of the improvements carried out by the vendees.

The result has been three appeals one by Lal Muhammad, one by Ulfat Rai and Lal Muhammad and one by Joti Parshad. Since the suits were consolidated by the trial Court and a single argument on all three has been addressed to us, I shall deal with all three appeals in one judgment.

There is now no dispute on the following points :—

1. All the property was ancestral in the eye of the Hindu Law.

2. Unless the mortgage debt of Ishri Parshad was incurred by Maharaj Narain for immoral purposes as understood by the Hindu Law, the ancestral family estate in the hands of the son is liable for it.

3. The onus of proving that the debt was immoral is on the plaintiff and is not discharged by merely proving that Maharaj Narain was a man of immoral character. Direct connection between the debt and the immorality must be shown.

4. No proof has been given by the appellant-defendants that the cash portions of the sale prices were required for or applied to family necessities, beyond the statement of Ishri Parshad that after the sale to Joti Parshad, the deed of which he attested he received Rs. 2,000 out of the price towards his mortgage charge.

5. The antecedent debt due to Ishri Parshad on the mortgage of 1907 amounted to Rs. 7,400 principal and interest at the time of the sale to Lal Muhammad.

The issues framed by the trial Court were as follows :—

1. Whether the property in the three suits was ancestral or joint family property in the hands of Maharaj Narain?

2. Whether the properties in question being ancestral in the hands of Maharaj Narain their alienation to the respective vendees in the three suits was for consideration and necessity?

3. Whether the vendees have effected any improvements in the property, and if so, of what value?

4. Whether the vendees are entitled to any compensation for improvements if the sales are held invalid? If so, what?

5. Whether the consideration of the alienations was used for or applied to immoral purposes and consequently the sales are invalid?

6. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to any mesne profits realised by the vendees alienees? If so, what?

The findings of the trial Court are not very lucidly expressed, but they appear to have been as follows :—

Issue No. 1. The properties were ancestral. This is not now contested.

Issue No. 2. There was no necessity for the sales. Maharaj Narain had ample income for all the legitimate purposes and the mortgage-debt was not an antecedent debt in the light of what was ruled by the Privy Council in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1), because it was not incurred irrespective of the credit obtainable from immoveable assets not belonging personally to the vendor alienor but being joint family property. Consideration was paid in full.

Issue No. 3. Rs. 2,000 and Rs. 500 were the amounts spent on improvements to the properties.

Issue No. 4. The vendees are entitled to these amounts because had it not been for the decision in Sabhu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1), the debt due to Ishri Parshad would have been an antecedent debt and the vendees would have only been bound to see that the debt was due. At the time of the mortgage to Mul Chand in 1905 Maharaj Narain's immorality was not notorious and Mul Chand could have had no suspicion that Maharaj Narain was a man of that character. Lal Muhammad, when he bought the property, had reason to believe that up to the limit of the previous mortgage-debt the transfer would be valid. In equity, therefore, he is entitled to receive the value of the improvements.

(This is the best that I can make out of the cryptic language used by the learned Subordinate Judge in recording his decision on Issue No. 4. It may not be a correct interpretation of what he has written and there is much to be said in favour of regarding this part of his judgment as absolutely meaningless.)

Issue No. 5. When Maharaj Narain contracted the debts in question he had given himself up to a life of luxury and licentiousness and was wasting money in entertaining prostitutes and in riotous living. "There is no clear evidence on the record that any portion of these debts was intended to be spent or was as a matter of fact expended on litigation or in meeting the legitimate expenses of any domestic ceremonies. The alienees were neighbours and were aware of the mode of deceased's life. The plaintiff is, therefore, under no obligation to discharge the said debts."

I confess I am not clear whether the learned Subordinate Judge when speaking of debts meant the antecedent mortgage-debts of the prices paid by the subsequent vendees at the sales which are now in dispute. The obscurity of the finding on Issue No. 4 deepens the mystery.

Issue No. 6. There is a confused and involved decision about mesne profits which in view of my conclusions on the other points in issue, it is unnecessary to attempt to disentangle.

Sahu Ram's case (1) was subsequently considered by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad Rai (2), and it was there made clear that any debt is an antecedent debt if it is antecedent in fact as well as in time, i.e., truly independent and not a part of the transaction impeached. This decision affirmed the view taken by the Full Bench in Arumugham Chetty v. Muthu Koundan (3), that an independent debt, neither illegal nor immoral, contracted by a Hindu father on the security of the joint family estate antecedent to a mortgage sued on, is an antecedent debt so as to support a charge on the son's share to the extent of the sum secured on the prior mortgage. There are passages in the learned Subordinate Judge's judgment which indicate the possibility that had the later pronouncement of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee been before him he might have held that the plaintiff was liable for either part or perhaps for the whole of the antecedent mortgage-debts to Ishri Parshad, but I cannot be sure.

The two main questions for our decision are:—

1. Whether at the time when the mortgage-debt to Ishri Prashad was incurred Maharaj Narain was leading an immoral life?

2. If so, whether the plaintiff has succeeded in giving direct connection between the debt and the immorality?

If the plaintiff succeeded on these two points it is obvious that the decision by the trial Court that he is entitled to decree for possession of the properties in dispute is correct. If the plaintiff fails on these two points a third question arises, whether the plaintiff is still entitled to avoid the sale by reason of there being no necessity established for the balance of the price over and above the amount due on the former mortgage-debt?

Several witnesses have described the debauchery of Maharaj Narain in violently extravagant terms. The learned Subordinate Judge appears to have been influenced by a decision of the Chief Court in a similar suit between the present plaintiff and another alienee from Maharaj Narain which is reported as 10 P. R. 1918 [Jaswanti v. Tej Narain (4)] and more fully as 41 Ind. Cas. 192. In that case the learned Judge of the Chief Court found apparently that Maharaj Narain was a man of most conspicuously dissolute mode of life, but the finding is not evidence in this case and cannot be allowed to influence its decision. On the evidence of the present record I consider it to be established that Maharaj Narain neglected his wife for women of ill fame, that he kept a succession of mistresses and that he drank heavily. The most reliable witness on the point is Musammatt Maharaj Rani his own wife, and allowing for exaggeration this is the purport of what she deposed. This lady most naturally wishes to support her son in the present case and I do not look upon her account of the late Maharaj Narain's daily life as altogether unprejudiced. At the same time she is the person who was in the best position of knowing his habits and conduct. But the numerous other witnesses who say that day and night all the year round Maharaj Narain was engaged in the ceaseless round of drunken and disrespectful orgies I do not believe.

There has been a tendency in this case to confuse the immorality with ordinary extravagance. Mr. Bose who was for some time acting as Maharaj Narain's legal adviser has stated that Maharaj Narain was extravagant in an innocent manner by living beyond his means in the matter of food, servants, furniture etc. It is also clear that he gave frequent and expensive musical parties and the money expended upon them although the performers may have been persons of loose morals, could not with certainty on the evidence before us be brought within the category of debts contracted "under the influence of lust or wrath or of debts repugnant to good morals." It is proved that Maharaj Narain was maintaining a house in which he kept his wife and son. The evidence as regards his ordinary income is very vague. The learned Subordinate Judge after considering a mass of conflicting evidence, has estimated it at Rs. 7,900 a year or a little over Rs. 650 a month. He had house property which brought him Rs. 60 or Rs. 70 per mensem and had two villages in the Gurgaon District one Gopalpura which he owned and the other Bopas which he held in mortgage. The Patwari of Gopalpura as a witness for the plaintiff stated that the net amount which Maharaj Narain took annually from Gopalpura was not more than Rs. 1,300 or Rs. 1,400 and if this be accepted the annual income was not as much as Rs. 7,900. However that may be, it is clear that Maharaj Narain was not a rich man. It has been established that he was engaged from time to time in expensive litigation. One of the cases was against Kailash Narain a suit for Rs. 1,11,750. The learned Subordinate Judge mentioned this case in his judgment and thought that about Rs. 1,500 may have been spent on it by Maharaj Narain. At the request of the parties we have referred to the Paper Book of that suit, which came to Chief Court on appeal and this makes it clear that the litigation must have cost Maharaj Narain, who was unsuccessful throughout, a sum not less than Rs. 6,500 and probably more. The suit was instituted in 1904, was dismissed by the trial Court in December, 1904 and Maharaj Narain's appeal was dismissed with costs by the Chief Court in 1911. The Court-fee alone was Rs. 1,500 in each Court, the amount which the learned Subordinate Judge thinks might have been spent on the whole litigation. There was another case with one Musammatt Banoji the ultimate result of which is reported as Maharaj Narain v. Banoji (5), and it must have cost more than the learned Subordinate Judge has estimated.

Bopas village was redeemed from Maharaj Narain and he received Rs. 7,000 on the 24th April, 1904, Rs. 1,000 sometime before 16th November, 1905 and Rs. 21,000 in 1908. It has been suggested that Maharaj

Narain's ordinary expenditure and his expenses on litigation up to the time of the mortgage to Ishri Parshad in 1907 could have been defrayed from the annual income money of Rs. 7,900 and the redemption money of Rs. 8,000 and that the money raised by the mortgage must inevitably be presumed to have been spent on dissipation. This is as far as the plaintiff has been able to go to connect the mortgage-debt with Maharaj Narain's immorality, and, in my opinion, he has not been successful in discharging the onus upon him. The facts are that Maharaj Narain was not a rich man, that his ordinary income cannot be estimated with any attempt at certainty, that he involved himself in expensive litigation that he lived beyond his means and that he was given to drink and prostitutes. It is possible that the mortgage-money may have been spent on immoral pursuits; it is equally possible that the redemption money and an undue proportion of the ordinary annual income was expended on dissipation and it became necessary to mortgage the house property in order to obtain money for the support of Maharaj Narain's wife and child and for carrying on litigation. It is not the law that a Hindu son can escape liability to pay any debt which is contracted by an immoral father. The mortgage-debt due to Ishri Parshad was an antecedent debt binding upon the plaintiff and he has not succeeded in proving that it was incurred for immoral purposes.

I hold that the mortgage charge of Rs. 7,400 was an antecedent debt not proved to have been tainted with immorality for the discharge of which the joint family property including the plaintiff's share was liable. It remains to consider whether the plaintiff can have the sales set aside by the reason of the properties in suit having been alienated for prices which left a surplus over the amount of that debt.

What the situation was, I think, is perfectly clear. There was a mortgage charge upon the four properties and they were sold primarily in order to clear off this charge on which interest was accumulating. Three of the properties were first disposed of to Lal Muhammad, Rs. 5,400 was taken to be the proportion of the mortgage charge due on them. Lal Muhammad was aware of this charge, took the precaution of retaining in his own hands the sum of Rs. 5,400 and paid off the mortgagee. The vendor succeeded in obtaining a higher price than the mortgage charge and the balance Rs. 1,600 was paid over to him. There is no evidence of what he did with the money. I see no reason why Lal Muhammed should not be believed when he deposed that he did not know Maharaj Narain before he entered into negotiations for the sales, and that he made enquiries and was told that Maharaj Narain was engaged in litigation and required money for prosecuting the cases. Lal Muhammad is a Christian and it is not proved that he had any previous acquaintanceship with Maharaj Narain or any reason for having it. He came to Delhi in 1908.

When the fourth house was sold two months later to Joti Parshad Rs. 2,000 remained due on the mortgage. Joti Parshad had paid the whole price of Rs. 3,000 to Maharaj Narain but he has proved that Rs. 2,000 were immediately paid to Ishri Parshad the mortgagee.

Thus it has been established that the sales were made for a necessary purpose, i. e., in order to pay off an antecedent debt which was binding upon the plaintiff and recoverable from the joint family property and there is no evidence of how the vendor has applied Rs. 2,600 out of the total proceeds of Rs. 10,000. I consider that there is no reliable evidence either that the vendees knew Maharaj Narain to be an immoral man or that the immorality was so gross and so notorious that they must be presumed to have known of it.

In these circumstances the vendees were duly bound to show that they acted in good faith and that the sales were made for a necessary purpose and for a fair price. Having done this they were under no obligation to enquire into the application of any surplus over the sum required to carry out the necessary purpose.

This is how the law has been interpreted by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in a very recent case, Sri Krishn Das v. Nathu Ram (6). The suit was by sons to recover from the vendee ancestral property purchased from their father for Rs. 3,500. The facts found were that the vendor had incurred debt in setting aside the auction-sale of the same property and in celebrating his sister's marriage that in order to meet part of his indebtedness he had borrowed from a money-lender Rs. 2,600 which had been increased by interest to Rs. 3,000, that this amount was discharged out of the consideration paid by the vendee, that before purchasing the property, the vendee had ascertained these facts, and that there was no evidence of how the vendor had applied the balance of Rs. 500. The High Court of Allahabad on second appeal had reversed the District Judge's order dismissing the suit and had given the plaintiff a decree setting aside the same on condition of the plaintiff paying the vendee Rs. 3,000 within six months. Their Lordships of the Privy Council referred to a number of their previous decisions and delivered their conclusions as follows:—

"Applying the principles laid down in the above series of cases by this Board, and consistently followed in other Courts in India, except in Allahabad, their Lordships have reached the conclusion that the judgment of the High Court cannot be sustained. On the facts found by the District Judge it must be taken that the sale challenged was made after due enquiry as to legal necessity by the vendee; that such necessity has been proved by him to the extent of Rs. 3,000 out of a total price of Rs. 3,500; that the sale was for an adequate consideration, and the mere fact that, after a long interval of time, the appellants have not been able to establish how the surplus of Rs. 500 was applied is not a sufficient ground in law for setting aside the sale. They will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the judgment and decree of the High Court should be set aside, and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs in all the Courts, including the costs of the present appeal."

The proper manner in which such cases are to be treated by the Courts was stated in an earlier passage in the judgment which runs as follows:

"In their decision the learned Judges of the High Court rely on the authority of the case of Girdharee Lal v. Kantoo Lal (7) and especially on the head-note which contains the passage:

"Where a father has sold ancestral property for the discharge of his debts, if the application of the bulk of the proceeds is accounted for, the fact that a small part is not accounted for will not invalidate the sale."

(7) 1 I. A. 321; 22 W. R. 56; 14 B. L. J. R. 187; 3 Sar. P. C. J. 380 (P. C.).

"While this is in itself a correct statement of the law so far as it goes, it does not by any means follow, as the learned High Court Judges seem to have thought that it is a complete statement of the law or that same will be invalidated wherever the part of the consideration not accounted for cannot be described as small. If this were sound the question would in each case be a matter of arithmetical calculation and opinions would necessarily vary as to what constituted the 'bulk of the proceeds' or 'a small part' of the same in each particular case. The learned Judges seem to have lost sight of the true question which falls to be answered in such cases, viz., whether the sale itself was one which was justified by legal necessity."

The following previous decisions of the Allahabad High Court in which conditional decree had been passed setting aside similar sale or directing the surplus not covered by legal necessity to be returned, were overruled; Gobind Singh v. Baldev Singh (8), Ram Dai Kunwar v. Abu Jafar (9) Dawarka Ram v. Jhulai Pande (10) and Daulat v. Sankatha Parsad (11).

For these reasons I would accept all the three appeals and in each case would enter judgment for the defendant, dismissing the plaintiff's suit with costs throughout.

Usury Laws Repeal Act (XXVIII of 1855), s. 2—Interest—Power of Court to reduce interest on equitable grounds.

A Muhammadan woman and her son who was 45 years of age executed a mortgage to the plaintiff for Rs. 827 agreeing to pay interest thereon at 25 per cent. per annum and with a further stipulation that if the debt was not paid within one year the interest should be compounded yearly. The plaintiff giving credit for Rs. 1,600 received as interest sued for Rs. 4,224 further interest and Rs. 827, the principal. The trial Court allowed simple interest alone on equitable grounds:

Held, that the circumstances of the case did not warrant the inference of any undue influence, that the plaintiff was entitled to compound interest as agreed upon and that the Court had no power to reduce the same. [p. 183, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

Heald, J.—The respondents Mi Robeya and Abdul Hakim are an elderly Muhammadan woman and her son, the son being 45 years of age.

In 1916 they owed to appellant Rs. 596 under a decree and Rs. 231 on a promissory note and in order to secure payment of those debts they executed a mortgage-bond in appellant's favour for Rs. 827. The bond recited the details of the debt and contained an undertaking on the part of respondents to pay the debt within a year, with interest at 25 per cent. per annum, and a stipulation that if the debt was not paid within the year, interest should be compounded yearly.

The debt was not paid within the year and has admittedly not yet been paid in full, and appellant sues respondents on the bond. He gives credit for Rs. 1,600 received as interest and sues for Rs. 4,224-4 further interest as well as Rs. 827 the original principal.

Respondents plead that the transaction was unusual and usurious and that they are entitled to the benefit of the Usurious Loans Act.

The learned Judge held that the suit was not a suit to which the Usurious Loans Act applied, but he was nevertheless of opinion that he had a discretion to give equitable relief, and he allowed simple interest only.

Appellant alleges in appeal that in the absence of any pleading of undue influence the Court was not entitled to allow interest otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the bond.

Section 2 of the Usury Laws Repeal Act (XXVIII of 1855) says expressly that in any suit in which interest is recoverable, the amount shall be adjudged or decreed by the Court at the rate agreed upon by the parties. Unless, therefore, the terms of the agreement between the parties were so harsh and unconscionable as to show that consent to them must have been induced by undue influence, the Court was bound to decree interest at the contract rate.

The circumstances which, it is suggested, indicate undue influence are—

(1) that one of the parties to the contract was an elderly Muhammadan woman;

(2) that the value of the property given as security was out of proportion to the amount of the debt;

(3) that in view of the value of the security the interest was unduly high and

(4) that the result of the transaction is that for a debt of Rs. 827 respondents have to pay Rs. 6,651-4-0.

It seems to me that these considerations, even taken together, are not sufficient to warrant an inference that the relations subsisting between the parties were such that appellant was in a position to dominate the will of the respondents. The debtors were mother and son, and the son was some 45 years of age. There is nothing to suggest that the son was not then in a position to assist and advise his mother in the management of her affairs, as he is admittedly assisting and advising her now. The debt, in comparison with the value of their property, was very small, the property which they gave as security being according to the lower Court, worth about Rs. 9,000 while the debt was only Rs. 827. Respondents could, therefore, have rid themselves of the debt forthwith by selling a mere fraction of the property which they admittedly possessed. It is true that the security given was unnecessarily large, but they need never have given security at all, and the only presumption which can be drawn from their giving it is that they desired to keep their property and had no doubt that they would be in a position to pay off the debt without selling any of their lands. If they had paid the debt within a reasonable time they would not have been adversely affected by the fact that they had given as security more property than was necessary, and I do not think that the fact that they gave so large a security for so small a debt indicates in the circumstances of the case that appellant was in a dominant position and used that position to obtain an unfair advantage. The unfairness of the advantage which appellant actually gained was due not to appellant's being in a position to dominate the will of respondents but to respondents' disregard of their own interests, and is, therefore, no indication of undue influence. As for the rate of interest, which works out for the first year at slightly over Rs. 2 per cent, per mensem, it is certainly not unusually high for this country even when the security is good, and respondents doubtless thought that the stipulation that interest should be compounded yearly would not affect them as they intended to re-pay the debt within the first year.

I am of opinion that the transaction was not in itself harsh or unconscionable and that its terms are not such as to indicate that it was induced by undue influence. Its operation has become harsh by reason merely of the foolishness of the debtors who when they could have paid off the debt by the sacrifice of a small portion of their property preferred to pay interest on it and to give security which was unnecessary, and who in spite of the fact that they had agreed to pay compound interest neglected to pay the debt, for many years, with the result that after some years the amount due as interest yearly was more than the amount of the original debt. It is, of course, a hard case, but I think that the learned Judge in the lower Court forgot that it is hard cases that make bad law, and that his reasons for giving relief were sentimental rather than judicial.

I would, therefore, set aside the judgment and decree of the lower Court and give appellant a decree for the full amount claimed with costs.

Mya Bu, J.—I concur.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Family business—Speculative transaction, debts incurred for—Liability of one.

In the case of the members of a Hindu family there is a presumption of jointness not only of their properties but even as regards the business which they carry on and the burden lies upon the person who alleges that the business is a separate business and not a family business to prove his allegation. [p. 184, col. 1.]

The manager of a joint Hindu family has an implied authority to contract debts for the ordinary purposes of the business carried on by the family. He has power to incur debts for the business in speculative transactions as such debts cannot be said to be immoral. [ibid.]

The pious obligation of Hindu sons to pay off their father's debts extends to commercial debts. [p. 184, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Hissar, dated the 31st March, 1926, reversing that of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Gurgaon, dated the 7th January, 1926.

Mr. Mahesh Das, for the Appellants.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—A joint Hindu family consisted of the father, Prabhu Dial, his eldest son, Duli Chand, and two other sons Daya Kishan and Narinjan Lal. In this family there was a Firm, Prabhu Dial-Duli Chand, styled after the father and the eldest son. It had dealings in Bombay. In 1923 the father Prabhu Dial died and a Bombay firm obtained a decree against the Firm, Prabhu Dial-Duli Chand, on the 21st May, 1924. This decree was being executed in the Gurgaon District. Two properties were attached. The two plaintiffs, who are the two sons whose names are not in the firm name, objected that the two properties attached belonged to them. Their objections were dismissed. They then filed a suit for a declaration that they could not be attached and sold in execution of the decree in question. According to the plaintiff one plaintiff was the sole owner of one of the houses, and the other plaintiff of the other. It was verbally stated that there was a private partition in the family shortly before the father's death. The only other point taken in the plaint which it is necessary to give was that it was alleged that the decree against the firm was for badni transactions that the plaintiffs were not parties to the decree, and that all the three brothers worked separately. The trial Court dismissed the suit, holding that there was no proof of any partition and that the family continued joint. It also held that the firm must be presumed to be a joint family business carried on by the father in his own name and that of his eldest son.

The District Judge on appeal decreed the claim. He too held that it was a joint family throughout but on his further finding that the firm had not been proved to be a joint family business he held that the plaintiffs could not be liable. Even on this finding it is clear that he should have allowed the one-third share of the eldest son Duli Chand to be attached and sold, and this was admitted before me during the hearing of this appeal.

It has been held in Koondan v. Ram Dyal (1) that the legal presumption is that a Hindu family is joint and undivided in business as well as in other respects. The same view has been taken in Grey v. Walker, Goward & Co. (2). In that case there was a joint Hindu family of a grandfather and his grandsons. The business was carried on in the name of the grandfather and the eldest grandson, just as here it was carried on, in the name of the father and the eldest son. It was there laid down that there was no doubt in cases of families of this nature that there was a presumption of jointness not only of their properties but even as regards the business which they carried on, and that if any member set up that a particular portion of the property formed his separate property the onus of proving that lay on the member who so claimed. It was, therefore, held that it was for the person alleging it to prove that in fact the business was the separate business of the grandfather. Nothing could be clearer than this finding.

Paragraph 198 (1) of Mulla's Hindu law also is to the effect that the manager of a joint family business has an implied authority to contract debts for the ordinary purposes of the family business. It must be presumed that this was a family business and it was for the plaintiffs to prove that they had no concern with it. They did allege that the debts were contracted on account of badni transactions, but, even if this were the case, the sons would still be liable, for the father could incur debts for the business in speculative transactions as they cannot be said to be immoral. In this connection see Khem Chand v. Narain Das Sethi (3). This same ruling lays down further that where mortgages were effected by a Hindu father of joint family property for debts incurred in the ordinary course of business the whole co-parcenary property was available for such debts. Similarly, in Nidavolu Atchutan v. Ratnaji (4) it was held that the pious obligation of sons to pay their father's debts extends to commercial debts.

As, therefore, the deceased father was the manager of the family and of the business, the plaintiffs who are two of his sons would also be liable for the business debts as they have not proved that they were tainted with immorality. Both for this reason and for the reason that it was for them to establish that they had nothing to do with the business, I accept this appeal and dismiss the plaintiffs' suit with costs throughout.

[Case-law referred to.]

FACTS.—Rajabally and Damodar were partners of the Firm of Mulla Abdul Kadir-Mulla Ebrahim Kachwalla. Nensukhgavri and others sued these partners and obtained a money-decree against them on 30th June, 1925, in Suit No. 613 of 1925. Before the passing of the decree in this suit these partners filed Suit No. 440 of 1925 for dissolution of the partnership and an interim Receiver was appointed in that suit. On the 10th July, 1925, the decree-holders applied for execution of their decree against the assets of the partnership in the Receiver's hands, and a charging order was made on the assets of the firm on the 16th July, 1925. The Receiver on receipt of notice of the order replied that the partnership suit had been referred to a Commissioner for taking accounts and referred the decree-holders to the Commissioner. The decree-holders did not accede to this step but applied in Chambers for an order on the Receiver to pay their amount. The application was adjourned till the completion of the examination of the accounts. The Commissioner was subsequently directed by the Court to call in the claims of creditors of the firm and to investigate and make a report on the same. The Commissioner acted accordingly and made report of the claims of all the creditors investigated including the decree-holders in Suit No. 613 of 1925. These decree-holders applied to the Chamber Judge again for an order of payment and his Lordship, Mirza, J., before whom the application was made, directed them to take out a summons. The decree-holders took out summons accordingly.

Mr. Mulla, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Kanga, Advocate General, for Defendant No. 2.

JUDGMENT.—[His Lordship stated the facts and continued as follows :—] This is a Chamber summon taken out by the plaintiff in Suit No. 613 of 1925 for an order that the Receiver appointed in Suit No. 440 of 1925 do pay to the plaintiffs the sum of Rs. 23,406-3-0 and costs of the suit when taxed and further interest on judgment till payment out of the funds in the hands of the Receiver belonging to the partnership firm of Mulla Abdulla Kadar Mulla Ebrahim Kachwalla in priority to the claims of the other creditors of the said partnership firm and for costs of the summons.

It appears that the charging order in favour of the plaintiffs is prior in date to the other charging orders obtained herein. In the course of these proceedings the plaintiffs, after they had proved their claim before the Commissioner, seem to have acted on the assumption that in respect of their claim they were entitled to rank pro rata only along with the other creditors of the partnership. The change in their attitude was probably due to the fact that recently I have had to consider the nature and effect of such charging orders against partnership assets, and have held, in my judgment, that such charging orders were not justified, but could only be regarded as substitutes for notices under O. XXI, r. 52, and that if they came under that description the first attaching creditor of the assets in the hands of the Receiver would have priority against the subsequent attaching creditors.

The summons is opposed by the remaining creditors of the partnership—both those who have obtained charging orders or notices under O. XXI, r. 52, and those who have not obtained any such as well as those who have not yet obtained any decrees in respect of their claims. They all contend that in the events that have happened the Court should distribute the assets of the partnership among the creditors rateably.

In Kahn v Alli Mahomed Haji Umer (1), Farran, J., laid down a proposition the application of which in matters subsequent to it has led to some difficulty. The principle there enunciated was that, where a fund, such as the assets of a partnership, is in the hands of the Court through its officer, the Receiver, one out of the whole body of creditors against the fund will not be allowed to gain priority over the rest by the expedient of attaching the moneys in the hands of the Receiver. Such an attachment would be an interference with the Court's possession through its officer, the Receiver, and may not, therefore, be made without the Court's leave first obtained; which leave will not be granted except on such terms as will ensure equality between the creditors.

(1) 19 B. 577; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 863.

The plaintiffs, in that case, had obtained a decree against the defendant and had attached moneys in the hands of the Receiver appointed in a suit which was filed in the High Court by certain creditors of the defendant, who were Receivers of his share in a certain partnership business against the partners of the defendant in that business for dissolution and winding up of the partnership. The decree in that suit dissolved the partnership, appointed a Receiver, and referred the suit to the Commissioner for taking accounts of the partnership and to ascertain the share due to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs in the partnership action before Farran, J., were probably the Receivers in execution proceedings against the share of the defendant in the partnership business. Such assets, when realised, would be realised in execution and the principle of the pro rata distribution would apply to them in so far as the then pending attachments were concerned. The creditor in the suit before Farran, J., had sought to attach the assets realised by the exertion of the Receivers in execution to the detriment of the attaching creditors on whose behalf the Receivers were acting. The attaching creditor had not obtained leave of the Court before attaching the assets and the attachment was clearly on that account wrong. The remarks of the learned Judge regarding the principle to be applied, in my opinion, are only obiter dicta and do not form the ratio decidendi of his decision. The learned Judge remarks (page 579*):—

"No Court of Equity would render any assistance to a creditor seeking by a side wind, such as this, to gain an advantage over his fellow creditors. A fortiori must that be the case where, as here, the creditor has obtained no leave before he took steps to interfere with the Receiver's possession, for such an interference the taking out of a prohibitory order clearly amounted to."

The decree with which Farran, J., was dealing contained no direction to take the accounts of the debts and liabilities of the partnership. The learned Judge remarked that if it were an ordinary partnership decree for winding up the partnership it would contain such a direction, and that although in form it did not contain that direction, it was probably intended to contain it, and for the purposes of the application before him, he must treat it as such. He, therefore, treated the decree as one under which the Commissioner would ascertain the debts due by the partnership and pay them rateably. With great respect it seems to me that the opinion expressed by the learned Judge on this point is not correct. Form 22, Appendix D, to the First Schedule of the Code provides the form in which a final decree in a suit for dissolution of partnership and the taking of partnership accounts is drawn up. The form is as follows:—

"It is ordered that the fund now in Court, amounting to the sum of Rs. , be applied as follows:—

1. In payment of the debts due by the partnership set forth in the certificate of the (Commissioner) amounting in the whole to Rs.

2. In payment of the costs of all parties in this suit, amounting to Rs.

3. In payment of the sum of Rs. to the plaintiff as his share of the partnership assets, of the sum of Rs. , being the residue of the said sum of Rs. now in Court, to the defendant as his share of the partnership assets..."

It is clear from this form that what is contemplated is not a payment by the Commissioner pro rata to the creditors of the partnership, but what is contemplated is that in order to enable the partners to obtain the fruit of the dissolution of the partnership, all its liabilities should be first paid off in full, secondly, costs of all parties should be paid off in full and then the division should take place. The form in an administration suit is necessarily different. In an administration suit, the Court is invited to administer the estate of the deceased and is in possession of all the assets of the deceased. In the case of a partnership the liability of the partners is unlimited. It cannot be restricted to the partnership assets and there is no reason why creditors should be compelled to await the result of a partnership account between the partners before they are allowed to obtain satisfaction of their decree out of the partnership assets.

In Sidlingappa v. Shankarappa (2), our Appeal Court, consisting of Candy, Ag. C. J., and Chandavarkar, J., have referred to Kahn v. Alli Mahomed Haji Umer (1), with approval. They state (page 559*):—

"We think, having regard to the principle

(2) 27 B. 556; 5 Bom. L. R. 529.

laid down by Mr. Justice Farran in the case of Kahn v. Alli Mahomed Haji Umer (1), followed in the case of Mahommed Zohuruddeen v. Mahommed Noorooddeen (3), it is very doubtful whether such an execution can be allowed. An officer of the Court is now executing that decree, and collecting the assets of the late firm and paying the debts of the firm, the decree-holders in the latter suit ranking as creditors of that firm."

I had occasion to point out in Kesserbai v. Kaku (4), that the statement made by the Appeal Court as above quoted was not necessary for the decision of the appeal which was before them, and is only in the nature of obiter dicta.

In Visvanadhan Chetti v. Arunachalam Chetti (5), a Full Bench of the Madras High Court considered the effect of O. XXI, r. 52, and held that where the property attached was in the custody of the Court, it was the duty of such Court to hold it at the disposal of the attaching Court and it was the duty of the attaching Court, if the property attached was money, to call upon the custody Court to pay it into the attaching Court and, in other cases, to provide for the realization of the property, and to divide the money or proceeds rateably between the attaching decree-holder and the other decree-holders who are entitled to distribution under s. 73, Civil Procedure Code, viz, those who have applied to it for execution before the receipt of such assets. Where the property in the custody Court is the subject of several attachments in execution of several decrees the custody Court must award priority to the first in point of time. If the other decree-holders want to share in the rateable distribution they must apply in time to the first attaching Court. The power conferred on the custody Court by the proviso to O. XXI, r. 52, Civil Procedure Code, to determine claims to priority, etc., does not entitle the custody Court itself to distribute the assets rateably among the attaching decree-holders. Where the attaching Court and the custody Court are the same, there is a receipt of assets within the meaning of s. 73, Civil Procedure Code, only when so much of the money standing to the credit of the judgment-debtor as is necessary to satisfy the decree-holders who have applied to it for execution, is ordered to be transferred to the credit of the first attaching creditor's suit. Order XXI, r. 52, requires that, where the property to be attached is in the custody of any Court or public officer, the attachment shall be made by a notice to such Court or officer, requesting that such property may be held subject to the further orders of the Court from which the notice is issued: provided that, where such property is in the custody of a Court, any question of title or priority arising between the decree-holder and any other person, not being the judgment-debtor, claiming to be interested in such property by virtue of any assignment, attachment or otherwise shall be determined by such Court. Wallis, C. J., commenting on the proviso to O. XXI, r. 52, says (page 107*):—

"This will include claims questioning the title of the judgment-debtor and other cases, but taking the present case of the property in the custody Court being made the subject of several attachments in execution of several decrees, the custody Court is then in my opinion required by the proviso to determine which of these attachments is entitled to priority, and in the absence of any legislative provision...to award such priority to the first attachment in date because that attachment became complete on the service of the notice on the custody Court and subsequent attachments cannot, in the absence of express legislative provision, affect the right of the first attaching creditor to have the attached property realised in execution of his decree and distributed rateably among the decree-holders entitled under s. 295, now s. 73, in satisfaction of their decrees. If the other decree-holders want to share in the rateable distribution, their proper course is to apply in time, if they can, to the attaching or executing Court; and if, instead of doing so, they choose to attach the property in the custody Court, the result will be that the attaching decree-holder who is second in point of time will be entitled to proceed in execution against any balance that may be left in the hands of the custody Court after the full satisfaction of the decree of the first attaching decree holder and of the other decree-holders who have entitled themselves to rateable distribution under s. 295, now s. 73, in executing his decree."

in Nachiappa Chettiar v. Subbier (6), Schwabe, C. J. thus summarizes the effect of the Full Bench decision (page 513*) :—

"The whole matter was, however, reconsidered in Visvanadhan Chetti v. Arunachelam Chetti (5) by a Full Bench of this Court and the proper interpretation of s. 73 was laid down. The Court was unanimous. It was held that 'assets held by a Court' did not include all money lying in Court to the credit of the judgment-debtor but only the assets levied in execution or paid into Court in satisfaction of the decree under execution, and that there is no receipt of assets within the meaning of s. 73 until the Court holding the money comes to the conclusion that no objection exists, and orders the money to be transferred to the credit of the first attaching creditor's suit, the decree in which it is engaged in executing."

It is clear from O. XXI, r. 52, that the moneys in the hands of the custody Court are not moneys which are realised within the meaning of s. 73 and, therefore, no pro rata distribution of such moneys can take place among the attaching creditors at that stage. Rule 307 of our High Court Rules would enable the judgment-creditor who has obtained an order under O. XXI, r. 52, to have a garnishee notice issued to the Receiver.

Where notices under O. XXI, r. 52, are served on the Receiver and in pursuance of a garnishee or other order of the Court he pays in the amount in respect of any such notice into the Sheriff's office, all execution creditors whose attachments are registered in the Negative Book of the Prothonotary before the realization of the assets by the Sheriff would be entitled to pro rata distribution. In case the property in the custody Court has been attached at the instance of different Courts the custody Court would seek to satisfy such attachments not pro rata, but in order of time, sending the moneys to the first attaching Court first the balance to the second and so on.

I must now consider whether the charging orders obtained by the plaintiffs and other decree-holders amount to attachment proceedings. The Prothonotary has not recognized them as such. They are not entered in his Negative Book. The history of these charging orders in our Courts shows that they are a misapplication of a certain practice, which prevails on the point in England. Macleod, J., is said to have started the practice and his judgment in Haji Ismail & Co. v. Rabiabi (7) is generally relied upon. Prior to this case a mention of the practice is to be found in the Appeal Court judgment in Shidlingappa v. Shankarappa (8). The judgment of Macleod, J., was based upon certain remarks contained in Kewney v. Attrill (9). The effect of such charging orders in England on assets of a partnership in a partnership suit, where the assets are held by the Court, through its Receiver is that the charging order gives priority to the person who obtains it as against every subsequent creditor as well as the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor. An exception is made in favour of the attorneys' lien for costs under the Solicitors' Act, 1860. The charging order under the Solicitors' Act is held in England to have a retrospective effect and whether that charging order is obtained by the Solicitors in England prior to or subsequent to the charging order contemplated in Kewney v. Attrill (9) the Solicitor's charging order will prevail. That was recognized in Ridd v. Thorne (10). The Annual Practice for 1926, at page 807, in considering this matter states that orders similar to the one made in Kewney v. Attrill (9) are frequently made being substitutes for leave to issue execution notwithstanding the possession of a Receiver, though they are not, strictly speaking, charging orders; they are valid against the trustee in bankruptcy of the partners but do not override the right of the Solicitor for the plaintiff to a charging order for costs under s. 28 of the Solicitors' Act, 1860.

In Shidlingappa v. Shankarappa (8) Chandavarkar, J., refers to Kewney v. Attrill (9) with approval. The remarks made by the learned Judge, however do not form the ratio decidendi of the Appeal Court's decision and must be regarded as obiter dicta. The learned Judge states (page 179*) :—

"By the appointment of a Receiver the Court must be taken to have aimed at equality amongst the creditors. It was open, of course, to any creditor of the partnership to sue the partners and obtain a decree for the recovery of his debt; but no creditor, after the appointment of a Receiver, could execute any decree, obtained after that appointment, to the prejudice of other creditors of the partnership. To obtain satisfaction of it he was bound to go to the Court which had appointed the Receiver and take its directions. That was recognized as the law in such cases in Kewney v. Attrill (9)."

In Haji Ismail & Co. v. Rabiabai (7) Macleod, J., gave priority to the attorneys' lien, for costs against the claims of attaching creditors on partnership assets in the hands of a Receiver. The learned Judge also remarked that in a case relating to partnership assets in the hands of a Receiver appointed by the Court judgment-creditors of the partnership should not attach the assets but obtain charging orders in the form proposed in Kewney v. Attrill (9). The remarks in Shidlingappa v. Shankarappa (8) were, however, understood to mean that what Kewney v. Attrill (9) decided was that in spite of the charging order in favour of the judgment-creditor all creditors of the partnership irrespective of their being attaching creditors or having obtained charging orders were to share rateably if the assets of the partnership were held by a Receiver. A somewhat anomalous position was created by the practice whereby charging orders were made for the asking but were valueless to give priority against any class of creditors. That practice led to a great deal of difficulty and hardship in the case of genuine judgment-creditors, anxious to have their decrees satisfied out of the partnership assets of their judgment-debtors. Collusive partnership suits were filed and bogus Receivers appointed in them in order to delay and defeat the creditors. I see no warrant in the Code of Civil Procedure for the practice introduced in the form of these charging orders. In my judgment the provisions of O. XXI, r. 52, should be given effect to. I am not prepared to regard the charging orders obtained in these proceedings as equivalent to notices under O. XXI, r. 52. Those charging orders will be discharged. To serve the ends of justice I shall, however, give a direction to the Receiver not to pay any moneys into the Sheriff's office in pursuance of any garnishee notice served upon him or otherwise, for one month from to day. It is open to all decree-holders who may so wish it in the meanwhile to obtain leave to attach the moneys in the hands of the Receiver and to have their claims in attachment registered with the Prothonotary under O. XXI, r. 52. When these moneys are paid into the Sheriff's office such creditors, in my opinion, will be entitled to rank pro rata. All creditors, who have not obtained decrees and have been misled by the notice of the Commissioner in inviting them to prove their claims before him, may, if so advised, file their suits, obtain decrees and attach. It may be open to them in case the partners have committed any act of insolvency to have them adjudicated insolvents and then all creditors will share rateably in the insolvency proceedings. I think this is a fit matter in which I should allow every creditor appearing before me to tack on the costs of the summons to his claim. Counsel certified. The directions I have already given on the priority of certain claims relating to the payment of taxes etc. will stand.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Alienation by father—Suit by alienee for possession—Burden of proof—Absence of legal necessity or antecedent debt—Purchaser's right to recover money enjoyed by son—Laches, effect of.

In a suit by a purchaser of joint family property from a Hindu father to recover possession of such property the onus is upon the purchaser to show in the first instance that there was either necessity or benefit or proper inquiry or an antecedent debt. It is only when the burden has been shifted by some prima facie evidence, that the sons can be called upon to show that the transaction was illegal or immoral or otherwise not binding on them, [p. 110, col. 2.]

In such a suit the purchaser will ordinarily be entitled to recover such part of the consideration as has been enjoyed by the sons, even though he is not able to prove legal necessity or antecedent-debt in the absence of any special reason disentitling him from such relief. [p. 191, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, A. C. J.—The plaintiffs sue for declaration of title to and confirmation of possession or, in the alternative, recovery of possession in respect of $4\frac{1}{2}$ bighas of land. This land is half of an area of 9 bighas which was purchased by the plaintiffs on the one hand and Gambhir Singh and Baldeo Singh on the other by a registered sale-deed, dated the 26th November, 1910, from the father of the defendants for a price of Rs. 1,500. By a private partition the plaintiffs claim to be in separate possession of $4\frac{1}{2}$ bighas.

An attempt was made to show that the plaintiffs are in direct possession; but the finding of both the Courts below is that the vendors of the plaintiff were in possession by receipt of rent from tenants.

The cause of action against the defendants is said to have arisen on the 30th July, 1921, when notwithstanding the sale to the plaintiffs, the defendants succeeded in getting their names recorded as proprietors in the registers of the Collector.

The trial Court found that the plaintiffs had not been able to show that there was necessity for the sale or that the plaintiffs were bona fide purchasers after inquiry. He also found that the plaintiffs had never got possession either direct or by collection of rents and he, therefore, dismissed the suit.

In appeal the District Judge found that the land was in the possession of rai-yats and that the plaintiffs were entitled to be entered in the Collector's registers as proprietors. He was of opinion that "when a father, as the head of a joint family, alienates joint family property, prima facie there is a presumption as against his sons that the alienation was for the benefit of the family, and the sons cannot repudiate the alienation unless they can show that it was for an illegal or immoral purpose."

As there was no evidence to prove that the sale was made for an illegal or immoral purpose, the learned Judge held that the plaintiffs' title was good.

It seems to me that the learned Judge is in error in his statement of the law. The plaintiffs must prove their title. The property is ancestral and the father had no right to sell either his share or the share of his sons except for necessity or for the benefit of the joint family. Evidence was given before the Munsif that the property was distant from the family homestead and was difficult to manage; but the learned Munsif found that this was not proved. The learned District Judge has thrown the onus upon the defendants to prove that the sale was made for an illegal or immoral purpose whereas he ought to have held that the onus was upon the purchaser to show in the first instance that there was either necessity or benefit or proper inquiry or an antecedent debt. It is only when the burden has been shifted by some prima facie evidence that the sons can be called upon to show that the transaction was illegal or immoral or otherwise not binding on them.

The appeal must, therefore, be re-heard by the learned District Judge and disposed of according to law.

The learned Vakil for the respondents, however, makes an offer. He says that he is willing to give up his title to the property on receiving his half share of the consideration money and that in any event he is entitled in equity to compensation of some kind. The appellants decline to settle on these terms and they contended that there is no equity in the plaintiffs' favour. They cite Badam v. Modho Ram (1) and Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (2).

In Modhoo Dyal Singh v. Golbur Singh (3) it was held that it was proved that the purchase money was carried to the assets of the joint estate and that the son had had the benefit of his share of it, he could not recover his share of the estate without refunding his share of the purchase-money. This view was affirmed in Honooman Dutt Roy v. Bhagbut Kishen (4) although it was observed in that case that it would depend on the facts of each case upon what terms the sons would be entitled to recover their share. The liability of the sons to refund the purchase-money was again affirmed in Koer Hasmat Rai v. Sunder Das (5). That was a suit for partition by the sons against the purchaser and also the father, and it was held that the sons would be entitled to recover their share of the property on refunding the whole of the purchase-money. The case was decided not on the equity arising out of their enjoyment of a part of the purchase-money (even though there was no proof of legal necessity) but on their liability to pay their father's debt. The Court was of opinion that the sons might have recovered the whole of the property if they had so framed their plaint; but that as they had only asked for the recovery of their fractional interest they would be limited to that relief, notwithstanding their liability for the whole of the purchase-money. This result was the natural consequence of the view that as soon as a decree for partition was made, a debt was created against the father which the sons were liable to pay. The correctness of this view, however, has been recently criticised in Greenivasa Aiyangar v. Kuppuswami Aiyangar (6), and it has been pointed out that the partition decree dated back to the date on which the plaint for partition was filed and that it could not be said that on that date there was any debt due by the father by reason of his having made a sale in respect of which there was a total failure of consideration. It was further pointed out that at most the father incurred a liability for damages, contingent on the event of the sale being set aside which could in no sense be called a debt incurred on the date of the sale.

It does not seem that in the above case there was any evidence that any portion of the purchase-money had been spent for the benefit of the sons and, therefore, the equity arising against the sons was not considered; but I think it is clear that where there is such evidence the son would not be permitted to recover his share of the property without doing equity by refunding his share of the purchase-money.

In the present case the plaintiffs purchasers might have sued the father for damages for failure of title and if they had obtained a decree, they would have been entitled to enforce it against the sons either on the footing that they were under a pious obligation or on the footing that they were in possession of the father's share of the assets of the family.

The purchasers might also have sued the sons as the heirs of their father for damages arising out of the contract of sale, but they have not done so.

The only question is whether, in the event of failing to show that the sale was for legal necessity or for the benefit of the joint family or for an antecedent debt or after proper inquiry, the purchaser in a suit for the possession of the land can enforce an equity against the son arising out of his enjoyment of a part of the purchase-money.

In Moyna Bibi v. Banku Behari Behari Biswas (7) the mother of a Muhammadan minor had mortgaged the minor's land to the plaintiff and the plaintiff sued to enforce that mortgage. It was held that as the mother was not the legal guardian the transaction was void and even though the minor had been benefited by the transaction the mortgagee could neither enforce his mortgage nor recover the consideration money which had been applied for the minor's benefit.

I think, however, that the decision of the Full Bench in Modhoo Dyal Singh's case (3) authoritatively lays down the principle of a Mitakshara son's liability for money of which he has had the enjoyment even though it was not borrowed for legal necessity. That case has not been overruled and I see no difference in the application of the principle whether the son is a defendant or a plaintiff.

I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs in the present case would have been entitled to recover such part of the consideration as had been enjoyed by the sons in the absence of any special reason disentitling them from such relief.

But here upon the findings there is such special reason. It has been found by the Munsif and also, though not very clearly, by the District Judge in appeal that the plaintiffs have not at any time been in possession since the date of the sale, that is to say, for nearly twelve years. It also appears to be a fact that the plaintiffs have never attempted to recover possession during this time. This is clearly a case of laches which debar the plaintiffs from any equitable relief.

(5) 11 O. 396; 10 Ind. Jur. 26; 5 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1023.

Therefore, it will not be necessary for the District Judge to consider whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover any part of the purchase-money.

All that the District Judge will have to determine when he re-hears the appeal is whether the plaintiffs have proved legal necessity or benefit to the joint family or inquiry or an antecedent debt. If they fail to justify the sale on any of these grounds, the decree of the learned Munsif will be affirmed. If they succeed, they are entitled to recovery of possession.

The decree of the District Judge is, therefore, set aside, and the case is remanded for disposal according to law. Costs will abide the result.

Agra Pre-emption Act (XI of 1922), ss. 1 (3), 3—Customary right of pre-emption in Municipal area, whether abrogated.

The Agra Pre-emption Act of 1922 has not abolished the customary right of pre-emption in Municipal areas to which the Act is not applicable.

Second appeal from a decree of the Third Additional Subordinate Judge, Aligarh, reversing that of the Munsif, Jalesar.

Messrs. Girdhari Lal Agarwala and J. S. Gupta, for the Appellant.

Mr. Peary Lal Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiff's appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption of property situated within the Municipal limits of the town of Jalesar. There were many points in dispute and the Court of first instance framed no less than four issues. One of the points was whether in view of the passing of the Agra Pre-emption Act, this suit was not maintainable. The Court of first instance in a clear judgment held that the Agra Pre-emption Act was not applicable to the suit and the case was governed by the old law. It then proceeded to consider the other issues and ultimately passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff. The lower Appellate Court has reversed that decree on the sole finding that under the Agra Pre-emption Act, all other rights of pre-emption have been abrogated.

We are of opinion that the lower Appellate Court has erred in this conclusion. Section 1, sub-cl. (3) of the Act clearly provides that it does not apply to any area included within the limits of a Municipality, Cantonment, Notified area or Town area. Then s. 3 provides that no right of pre-emption shall be enforced in respect of a transfer made after the commencement of this Act of an interest in relation to any area to which this Act applies except in accordance with the provisions of this Act. It then proceeds to make a special exception in favour of the Muhammadan Law. On the wording of these two sections it is quite clear that the customary right of pre-emption has been abolished only in areas to which this Act applies. Section 3 contains no other prohibition. It is not wide enough to abolish pre-emption even in areas to which the Act does not apply. Section 1, sub-cl. (3) clearly makes the Act inapplicable to a Municipality. In our opinion it follows that the Act has not abolished a customary right of pre-emption within a Municipal area to which the Act is not applicable.

The present case must, therefore, be governed by any custom that may prevail in the town.

We accordingly allow this appeal and setting aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court, send the case back to that Court for disposal of the remaining points in dispute. The plaintiff appellant will have his costs of this appeal from the defendants-respondents.

COMMISSIONER OF INCOME TAX

Income Tax Act (XI of 1922), ss. 22 (4), 23 (4), 66—Failure to comply with notice after filing of return—Summary assessment under s. 23 (4); legality of—Reference—Duty of Commissioner.

Failure of a person to comply with notices issued by an Income Tax Officer under s. 23 or s. 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1922, after the filing of a return does not authorise the officer to make a summary assessment to the best of his judgment under cl. (4) of s. 23 of the Act.

A notice under s. 22 (4) contemplated by s. 23 (4) of the Act concerns only the stage before the filing of a return.

In a reference under the Income Tax Act it is not sufficient for an assessee to suggest to the Commissioner the questions of law. It is for the Commissioner to find the facts first and then to state the point of law which arises out of those facts and on which he desires the opinion of the High Court.

Appeal from an order of the Commissioner, Income Tax, Bihar and Orissa, dated the 16th March, 1926.

Messrs. K. P. Jayaswal and S. P. Asthana, for the Appellant.

Mr. C. M. Agarwalla, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, A. C. J.—It is difficult to understand what is the special question of law upon which the Commissioner of Income Tax is asking for an opinion. It is not sufficient for an assessee to suggest to the Commissioner the questions of law. It is for the Commissioner to find the facts first and then to state the point of law which arises out of those facts and on which he desires our opinion. He may then, if he likes, give his own opinion on the case.

Both parties, however, have agreed before us to ask our opinion on the following question of law:

“Is an assessment under s. 23, cl. (4) of the Indian Income Tax valid in this case?”

The answer depends upon whether or not a breach of s. 22 (4) was committed.

Accounts or documents can be called for by the Income Tax Officer under s. 22 (4) after issue of notice and before the filing of the return.

After the filing of the return ss. 23 (2), 23 (3) and 37 give ample powers to the Income Tax Officer to call for whatever documents he requires. The failure to comply with any of the notices under these sections does not authorise the Income Tax Officer to make a summary assessment to the best of his judgment under cl. (4) of s. 23.

This last mentioned clause runs as follows:—

“If the principal officer of any company or any other person fails to make a return under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) of s. 22, as the case may be, or fails to comply with all the terms of a notice issued under sub-s. (4) of the same section or, having made a return, fails to comply with all the terms of a notice issued under sub-s. (2) of this section, the Income Tax Officer shall make the assessment to the best of the judgment.

The words “or having made a return” would be quite unnecessary if they were not intended to be in sharp antithesis to the preceding words and to show that in the view of the Legislature a notice under s. 22 (4) concerns only the stage before the filing of a return. Duni Chand Dhani Ram v. Commissioner of Income Tax, Punjab (1) and Pitta Ramaswamiiah v. Commissioner of Income Tax, Madras (2) were cited but it does not appear that the point was clearly raised and decided in these cases.

If then notice under s. 22 (4) can only be issued before the filing of a return, there could have been no breach of a notice under this clause in the present case and the summary assessment was illegal.

This assumes that there was in fact a notice issued under s. 22 (4) but the finding of the Income Tax Commissioner on this point is not clear.

He thinks that the order entered on the order-sheet of the 18th December, 1925, was sufficient to constitute a notice under s. 22 (4). But what is there to show that the notice was under this section? The notice might have been one under s. 37 or 23 (3).

Therefore, even if we assume that notice under s. 22 (4) can be issued after a return has been filed, such notice not having been issued in this case the summary assessment was illegal.

The assessee succeeds and will get the costs of this proceeding. Hearing fee five Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 5—Appeal—Application for stay of delivery dismissed as premature on respondent's objection—Respondent taking out execution by surprise—Overreaching of Court—Appellate Court's power to order re-delivery.

The appellant applied for stay of delivery of possession pending the disposal of the appeal. The respondent contended that the application was premature as he had taken no steps for delivery of possession, and the application for stay was consequently rejected. The respondent straightway applied for execution and took delivery of possession:

Held, that there was something in the nature of an overreaching of the Court on the part of the respondent and the delivery of possession could not be allowed to stand.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, A. C. J.—This is an application for stay under somewhat peculiar circumstances.

A Mahant named Damodar Das who was the trustee of the properties in suit borrowed money on a mortgage from the appellant Narain Sahu. The appellant got a decree on the mortgage and took possession of the mortgaged properties on the 17th December, 1908. Next Damodar Das was ejected from the office of Mahant by a decree of the Court under s. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure and one Rajkumar Das was installed in his place. Rajkumar then brought a suit against the appellant for a declaration that the mortgage was without necessity and for recovery of possession. His suit was dismissed.

Next Rajkumar was dislodged from the Mahantship on appeal and Damodar Das got back to his office. After his death his successor the respondent Ram Kirpal Das brings another suit on the same cause of action as Rajkumar for a declaration and for recovery of the mortgaged properties from the appellant.

This time the attempt has been successful and the Subordinate Judge of Darbhanga has decreed the claim on condition that the plaintiff Ram Kirpal deposits on or before the 30th April, 1927, a sum of Rs. 11,000 odd for the benefit of the appellant.

The appellant has preferred an appeal to this Court and he has also applied to the Registrar for a stay of execution. The Registrar issued an interim order for stay of execution, but on the 6th June, 1927, when the matter came up for hearing before him the respondent represented that the application was premature inasmuch as he had taken no steps whatever for delivery of possession. This argument prevailed with the Registrar and he dismissed the application for stay on the ground that there was no necessity for considering it at the moment.

At this point the respondent adopted what appears to me to be a very questionable move. He went straightway to the Execution Court and on the 10th June put in an application for delivery of possession and obtained delivery of possession on the 13th June.

The appellant having been taken by surprise then hurried to this Court and made an application on the 15th June, for the hearing of his application for stay of execution on the merits and for the cancellation of the order of delivery of possession and for restitution of the property.

We have heard the learned Vakils for the respondents on the circumstances under which he induced the Registrar to dismiss the application for stay on the 6th June, 1927. It is quite clear that if the Registrar had had any suspicion that the respondent was going straightway to the Execution Court to make an application and to take delivery of possession he would not have dismissed the application, but would have disposed of it on its merits. There has, in my opinion, been something in the nature of an overreaching of the Court on the part of the respondent and delivery of possession cannot be allowed to stand.

The next question is whether there should be a stay pending the hearing of this appeal. It is unnecessary for us to express any opinion as to the merits of the appeal but having heard the learned Vakil for the respondent fully we think that on the whole it is desirable that the appellant should not be compelled to give up the property till the appeal is disposed of. He has been in possession for nearly nineteen years and to say the least the fortunes of litigation in regard to the subject-matter of the suit are uncertain. The interests of the parties will be best served by directing that the order for delivery of possession be set aside and possession be re-delivered to the appellant upon his depositing on or before the 15th August next the sum of Rs. 6,000 as security for the mesne profits of the property pending the hearing of the appeal. The respondent will be permitted to withdraw at the end of each year a sum of Rs. 1,500 on account of the mesne profits which have been accrued during the year, on giving security of the same to the satisfaction of the Execution Court.

With regard to the sum of Rs. 11,000 odd already deposited by the respondent under the orders of the Subordinate Judge we direct that the respondent be permitted to withdraw this sum on condition that in the event of the appeal being dismissed he will within four months from the judgment of the Appeal Court bring back the money into Court.

The application is, therefore, allowed with costs. Hearing fee two gold mohurs.

Wort, J.—I agree.

A customary right of pasture on landlord's lands can be established by proper evidence if it is made out that from time immemorial the tenants have enjoyed it as of right and if from the circumstances it could be gathered that the right was enjoyed by them customarily or might be due to a lost grant. But such a right cannot be held to exist where the tenants used to apply to the landlord formally for permission to graze and the landlord used to give them permission on terms agreed to between him and the tenants. Mr. B. Somayya, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff the Poligar of Chettedu is the appellant before us. His claim in this suit was for a declaration that the kancha lands described in the plaint belong to him and for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from grazing cattle or trespassing thereon or in the alternative for possession in case the defendants or any of them should claim to be in possession of the lands. The defendants set up in defence that they had an occupancy right in respect of the lands, that it was a customary right that was possessed by them of grazing cattle there on payment of Rs. 170 per fasli and that they further had the right of taking brushwood, etc., from the lands and also of cultivating portions of the lands. It must be observed that the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge is very unsatisfactory. He held that there was a customary right in the defendants to graze the cattle there on payment of Rs. 170 per annum and awarding to the plaintiff the rent in respect of two faslis dismissed the plaintiff's suit in other respects. The so-called customary right set up by the defendants appears on examination to be based merely on user the lands for purposes of grazing from the year 1912, paying to the plaintiff a sum of Rs. 170 per annum. Before that it is clear that the rent collected by the plaintiff from the tenants for purposes of pasture was about Rs. 114. It is difficult to imagine how any customary right or even a prescriptive right came to be acquired or established by the use of these lands for purposes of pasture with the permission of the plaintiff during the years since 1912. The documents that have been filed in the case have no doubt whatever as to the real rights of the parties. In Ex. V (a) which is an account kept by the plaintiff in respect of these pasture lands it is clear that small-sums of money at so much per head of cattle appear to have been collected by the landlord for the grant of permission to the tenants to graze their cattle there. In Ex. N, the written statement filed by these very tenants in O.S. No. 825 of 1911 the tenants admitted that the cultivation of the small pieces of land comprised within the kancha lands was discontinued for 45 years or so. Exhibit Q is a sample of the kararnama entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants from the year 1912. We find there that such kararnamas were entered into between the tenants and the landlord and for the purpose of getting the permission of the landlord for grazing cattle, applications, it is clear, were made by tenants and darkhasts were issued. In Ex. B, for instance, we find that the tenants "pray that the landlord may grant the said field to the tenants for fasli 1326 for a reasonable amount after inspecting the grass now grown and obtaining a kararnama."

Exhibit C is another kararnama and there is a provision there for delivery of possession of the kanchas being given to the landlord at the end of the fasli. All these documents clearly show that during the whole period under reference the tenants used always to apply to the landlord formally for permission to graze the cattle and such permission was granted on terms agreed to between the landlord and the tenants. How in these circumstances any right in the defendants would come to be recognised or how any customary right to graze cattle in these kancha lands on payment of a customary rent of Rs. 170 can be established it is impossible to conceive. No doubt such a right can be established by proper evidence if it is made out that from time immemorial the tenants have enjoyed it as of right and if from the circumstances it could be gathered that the right was enjoyed by them customarily or might be due to a lost grant. But in a case of this sort where the rent has been increased with living memory, really within a few years, and where on every occasion on which the landlord grants permission to the tenants to graze the cattle they have had to apply for it and obtain such permission. It is impossible to find any right in the defendants as established. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that the land belongs to the plaintiff. If so, the burden of establishing that the defendants have any right of easement or any other right in respect of the lands lies heavily on them and on the materials before us it is impossible to hold that they have made out any such right. The lower Court was, therefore, clearly wrong in dismissing the plaintiff's action.

It is unfortunate that the proposals for compromising the differences in this litigation should have fallen through. But as the parties have not been able to settle there seems to be no other course open than to declare that the plaintiff is entitled to the perpetual injunction asked for. The dismissal of the plaintiff's suit must be set aside and a perpetual injunction granted against the defendants restraining them from grazing cattle, cultivating or taking brushwood, etc., without the permission of the landlord. If, however, the defendants or any of them should set up any claim to be in possession of any portion of the land which is the subject-matter of this suit, the plaintiff would also be entitled to have them ejected from such portions there in execution of the decree. The money-decree granted by the lower Court to the plaintiff will stand and Mr. Varadachariar on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant has not argued that it should be increased.

The order for costs made by the lower Court is also set aside and the plaintiff will have his costs throughout.

Mr. B. Sitarama Rao, for the Appellant.
Mr. K. Y. Adiga, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff's suit is for the redemption of a usufructuary mortgage executed by two brothers, Kesava and Krishna, on 2nd February, 1883, for Rs. 5,000. The plaintiff has purchased the equity of redemption from Kesava. The defendants have purchased from Krishna his share of the equity of redemption in the suit properties. The District Judge has given a decree to the plaintiff for the redemption of half the property and has allowed the defendants to consolidate the mortgage with a simple mortgage by Kesava. The plaintiff has preferred this second appeal.

The first point raised by Mr. Sitarama Rao for the appellant is that the District Judge should have allowed redemption of the whole of the property as a partial redemption is opposed to the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act. The finding is that the defendants have acquired the interest of Krishna in the equity of redemption. This finding is challenged by Mr. Sitarama Rao on the ground that defendants Nos. 1 to 3 have acquired the equity of redemption in respect of one of the properties and defendants Nos. 4 to 6 have acquired the equity of redemption in respect of the other item. The mortgage was with regard to two items of property only.

The question is whether the defendants have acquired the right of one of the mortgagors in all the properties mortgaged. It is immaterial whether the acquisition of the mortgagor's right was piecemeal or whether the acquisition was under one document.

If the mortgagee or mortgagees has or have acquired in whole or in part the share of the mortgagor the provisions of the exception to the last clause of s. 60, Transfer of Property Act, will apply. The clause is in the following terms :

"Nothing in this section shall entitle a person interested in a share only of the mortgaged property to redeem his own share only, on payment of a proportionate part of the amount remaining due on the mortgage, except where a mortgagee, or, if there are more mortgagees than one, all such mortgagees has or have acquired in whole or in part the share of the mortgagor."

Defendants Nos. 1 to 6 have acquired the interest of the mortgagees. They have also acquired the interest of one of the mortgagors, that is, the interest of Krishna. The plaintiff is not, therefore, entitled to ask for the redemption of the whole of the mortgaged property seeing that he has acquired only the interest of Kesava. The facts of this case bring it within the exception already mentioned. But it is urged that the law is against a partial redemption and, therefore, the plaintiff should be allowed to redeem the whole of the property and the defendants should bring a suit for their half share of the property. This contention is based on the ground that Krishna could not under the Hindu Law alienate any specific portion of the joint family properties and, therefore, those who have acquired the right to his share could only bring a suit for partition of the whole of the family property and in that partition their rights should be worked out. If it were a mere alienation of the family property by one of the members of a joint Hindu family, no doubt, the alienee would not be able to get possession of the specific items alienated to him. But here the question is complicated by the fact that both the members of the joint family made an alienation by way of mortgage of specific items and one of them sold his share of the equity of redemption. In these circumstances, the question is whether the Court would not be justified in allowing the defendants to retain one-half of the property and in decreeing the plaintiff only partial redemption of the half share of Kesava. The plaintiff acquired the right to the equity of redemption of Kesava knowing full well the facts of the case. There is evidence to show that Kesava knew that the defendants had acquired the rights of the mortgagee and also the share of Krishna to the equity of redemption. Could the plaintiff, who has only acquired the interest of one of the members of the joint family have insisted upon being given possession of the specific items? It is difficult to see how the plaintiff stands in a better position than the alienee from the other brother. If the strict rule of Hindu Law is to be applied the plaintiff would have to sue for partition of the property and in the partition the equities between the parties will have to be adjusted. This argument is met by the contention that Kesava being the managing member of the family has alienated the whole of the property and, therefore, the plaintiff stands in a better position than the alienee from Krishna. This contention overlooks the fact that Kesava could not alienate what he did not possess. The right to the share of Krishna having already been alienated to third persons Kesava could not give a title to the plaintiff in respect of Krishna's share and, therefore, the plaintiff does not stand in a better position than the alienees from Krishna. In such a case as this where the circumstances are such that it would lead to unnecessary litigation by granting the relief asked for by the plaintiff, the Court is not debarred from considering the equities in the case, and in order to avoid multiplicity of suits and unnecessary litigation, from granting only such relief as the equities of the case would justify without in any way prejudicing the rights of the parties.

Mr. Sitarama Rao relies strongly on Mirza Yaddali Beg v. Tukaram (1) in support of his contention that the District Judge was wrong in decreeing partial redemption. The facts in that case were: in 1893, A mortgaged 16 fields in Berar to B. In 1896 A conveyed one of the fields to C and others. In 1899 B brought a suit against A alone to enforce the mortgage and obtained a decree by consent. As A made default in payment within the time fixed, 9 of the fields were foreclosed and possession was handed over to B. C and others, not having been made parties to the suit were not affected by it, and they brought a suit for the redemption of the items. The Privy Council held that there could be no partial redemption, and that C and others who had acquired the equity of redemption to one of the fields were entitled to redeem all the nine fields. Viscount Haldane, in delivering the judgment of their Lordships, observed:—

“The only question that arises is whether they are entitled to redeem the whole of the nine fields, or only the field conveyed to them subject to the mortgage over the whole. According to English Law the respondents would have been entitled to redeem the mortgage in its entirety, subject only to the safe-guarding of the equal title to redeem of any other person who had a right of redemption, a point which has not arisen so far in the present case. The respondents, being transferees of part of the security, by English Law, if it applied, would on the one hand be entitled to redeem the entire mortgage on the properties generally, and correlatively could not compel the mortgagee to allow them to redeem their part by itself..... The Judge in the original Court thought that the decisions of the Courts in India had established that one of several mortgagors cannot redeem more than his share unless the owners of the other shares consent or do not object. Subject to proper safe-guarding of the rights to redeem, which these owners may possess, their Lordships are of opinion that this is not so in India any more than in England.”

This decision does not govern the present case as the defendants have acquired the right of the mortgagors to the mortgaged property. The decision of the Privy Council case would have been different if the persons who resisted the redemption had acquired in whole or in part the right to the equity of redemption from the mortgagor.

The decision in Velayadain Chetty v. Alangaram Chetty (2) affirms the principle that there cannot be a partial redemption except in cases where the mortgagees or mortgagees where there are more than one, has or have acquired in whole or in part the share of the mortgagor. As observed by the learned Judges in that case:

"The mortgage is one and indivisible and the exception only arises when the mortgagee, or, if there are more mortgagees than one, all such mortgagees have acquired in whole or in part the share of a mortgagor."

Mr. Adiga, for the respondents, relies upon Rathna Mudali v. Perumal Reddy (3) in support of his contention that the Court could decree partial redemption of a mortgage. The learned Judges who decided the case have laid down the principle too broadly. It is not open in all cases for the Court to decree partial redemption. It is unnecessary to canvass the correctness of this decision in the view we have taken of the facts of this case. It was not followed by a Bench of this Court in Deynatakath v. Patinharayil Avulla (4).

In support of the contention that the defendants can only bring a suit for partition in order to enforce their right to the properties, and they are not entitled to be given half the share of the specific items mentioned in the plaint, Nanjaya Mudali v. Shanmuga Mudali (5) is relied upon. In that case Sankaran Nair and Bakewell, JJ., held after an examination of various cases that:

"When a co-parcener alienates his share in certain specific family properties the alienee does not acquire any interest in that property but only an equity to enforce his rights in a suit for partition and to have the property alienated set apart for the alienor's share if possible. The alienee cannot sue for partition and allotment to him of his share of the property alienated."

In Kota Balabhadra Patro v. Khetra Doss (6) it was held that "an alienee from a member of a joint Hindu family is not entitled to possession of the alienor's share as a tenant-in-common. His only right is to obtain by a suit for partition the share to which his alienor is entitled."

(3) 17 Ind. Cas. 837; 38 M. 310; 12 M. L. T. 484; (1912) M. W. N. 1168; 23 M. L. J. 576.

(6) 37 Ind. Cas. 168; 31 M. L. J. 275; 4 L. W. 99; (1917) M. W. N. 149.

If a member of a joint Hindu family alienates any specific item belonging to the family the alienee is not entitled to possession of that property nor can he sue for partition of that property alone. A suit for partition must comprise all the property of the family which is capable of division. But here both the brothers alienated by way of mortgage specific items. The mortgagees were entitled to be in possession of those items. One of the mortgagors afterwards sells his share in those items and the other co-parcener is aware of such alienation and then alienates his share in favour of the plaintiff. In such circumstances the alienee from one sharer cannot insist upon his getting possession of the specific items. The law applicable to mortgages should be applied in cases of this kind and not the strict rule of Hindu Law which is against the alienee of a specific item of property from one co-sharer, claiming to be in possession of that property. The principle of the decision in Tadepalli Subba Rao Garu v. Balusu Buchi Sarvarayudu (7) can be applied to this. Though the facts of that case are different from the facts of this, yet the course adopted by the learned Judges in that case commends itself to us. We hold that the learned District Judge was right in decreeing the plaintiff partial redemption.

The next point urged is that the defendants are not entitled to consolidate the usufructuary mortgage with the simple mortgage executed by Kesava alone. The rule as to consolidation is applicable to Indian mortgages provided the mortgagee and mortgagor of both the mortgages sought to be consolidated are the same and the property mortgaged is also the same. There can be no consolidation of two mortgages if the properties mortgaged are different. This is clear from the illustration to s. 61 of the Transfer of Property Act. The mortgagor also should be the same. If A mortgages his share in one item of property and B mortgages his share of the same item to the same mortgagee, though the mortgagee may be the same and the property mortgaged may be the same the mortgagee is not entitled to insist upon A paying the whole of the mortgage amount due on the two mortgages before he can redeem the property. And conversely, if A mortgages the same property to B and then to C unless B acquires the rights of C in the second mortgage he cannot insist upon A redeeming both together. The second mortgage was a simple mortgage by Kesava to the 1st defendant. Defendants Nos. 4 to 6 are not interested in the mortgage. Therefore there can be no consolidation of the usufructuary mortgage with the simple mortgage. It is unnecessary to refer to any decision on this point as s. 61 of the Transfer of Property Act is quite clear. In the result the decree of the District Judge will be modified by disallowing the claim of the defendants to the consolidation of the mortgage under Ex. X with the usufructuary mortgage sought to be redeemed. With this modification of the lower Court's decree I dismiss the appeal without costs.

The memorandum of objections is dismissed without costs.

Mr. P. B. Sen, for the Appellant.

Mr. U Thein Maung, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The respondent, a Pleader of Pyinmana, was appointed Receiver of the estate of Maung Po Tok, who on his own application was adjudicated insolvent in Civil Miscellaneous No. 49 of 1925. As Receiver, the respondent took possession of certain articles of jewellery and immoveable property set out in his list filed at page 16 of the record. All the properties were mortgaged or pledged with the appellant Chettyar firm. Most, if not, all of these properties were sold by the respondent, who filed his accounts on the 6th July, 1926 (page 23) which shows a sum of Rs. 3,686-10-6 as having been realised, from which two sums, namely, Rs. 10 being the cost of notices for the sales and Rs. 368 being the Receiver's commission, were deducted.

On the 21st August, 1926, the appellant firm tendered a proof of debts due to them by the insolvents amounting to Rs. 20,413-8 out of which the Court admitted Rs. 12,641-6. Subsequently the appellant on finding that a sum of Rs. 378 had been deducted from the proceeds of sale conducted by the Receiver applied to the Court objecting to the deduction and pointing out that the appellant firm were the insolvent's secured creditors and that the amount realised by the Receiver was the proceeds of sale of properties pledged or mortgaged to them. By an order dated the 30th September, 1926, the Court dismissed the application and it is against this dismissal the appellant firm have appealed.

The Court appointed the Receiver under s. 56 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920. Under sub-s. (2) (b) the Court could fix the amount to be paid as remuneration for the services of the Receiver out of the assets of the insolvent. This remuneration was fixed in the shape of a commission at 10 per cent. which is an excessive rate. However, the District Court having fixed the remuneration at that rate the Receiver was entitled to get his remuneration at the rate so fixed but only out of the assets of the insolvent. Where any part of the insolvent's property is subject to a mortgage, it is only the value of the insolvent's right to redeem that property which can be his assets available for distribution. A Receiver is bound as a condition of dealing with mortgaged property to pay off the mortgage. The only interest the insolvent had and which vests in the Receiver was the equity of redemption [see Shridharnarayan v. Atmaram Gobind (1) and Shridhar Narayan v. Krishnaji Vithoji (2).] Thus if the property that vests in the Receiver is subject to a mortgage or incumbrance, it is only the equity of redemption which can be counted as assets going into the Receiver's hands.

(1) 7 B. 455; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 306.

(2) 12 B. 272; 6 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 667.

Where, therefore, any part of the insolvent's property subject to a mortgage is sold free from the mortgage and the Receiver realises the purchase-money, the whole of it is not assets available for distribution but only such part as remains in his hands after paying off the mortgage and it is only on such part that the Receiver is entitled to remuneration. This view is supported by In re Official Assignee's Commission (3). The learned Counsel for the respondent argues that this case is inapplicable to the one under consideration because the Official Assignee is governed by a special Act with which we are not concerned. We are unable to accept this argument inasmuch as the principles underlying the decision are the same as those upon which we are to proceed to decide the case. Even apart from the authority of this ruling we are satisfied that the Receiver is not entitled to remuneration on the whole of the proceeds of sale of property which is subject to a mortgage and that his remuneration should be calculated only on the portion of such proceeds remaining in his hands after satisfying the mortgage-debt. Moveable property held by a creditor in pledge must obviously be on the same footing as property subject to a mortgage for the purpose of the question before us.

Such an omission is not a material irregularity under O. XXI, r. 66, Civil Procedure Code.

Appeal against an order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Tiruvalur, dated the 14th July, 1926, in E. P. R. No. 62 of 1926 in O. S. No. 58 of 1924.

Mr. S. Jagadisa Iyer, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. S. Desikan, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It has never been held that the omission to state the value of the property is a material irregularity. When the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor differ hopelessly as to the probable value of the property, a statement as to the value by the Court is at best a guess and the Court may, in the circumstances of a particular case, consider it better to abstain from such guess. The case in Saadatmand Khan v. Phul Kuar (1) decides that where a Court has chosen to state the value in the proclamation, a gross under-statement is a serious irregularity. The other cases relied on by the Vakil for the appellant do not help him.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

MA E GYWE AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Burmese Buddhist Law—Buddhist monk—Purchasing and selling of property, legality of—Suit to enforce purchase—Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 23.

A Buddhist monk cannot engage in any transaction in which silver is used and he cannot engage in buying or selling. [p. 203, col. 1.]

Where a Buddhist monk who had borrowed Rs. 100 and purchased a house brought a suit to recover possession of the house:

Held, that the transaction was one forbidden by the personal law of the plaintiff and was, therefore, void under s. 23 of the Contract Act and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the house. [p. 204, col. 2.]

[Case-law discussed.]

Mr. Myint Thein, for the Appellant,

Mr. Ba Tun (2), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this appeal an interesting point of Buddhist Ecclesiastical Law is involved.

Appellant U Teza is a Buddhist monk who has been in the Order for over 23 years. He brought a suit against the children of Ma Oh to get them ejected from a house alleging that he had bought it by a registered deed from those defendants for Rs. 100 with borrowed money. The deed of conveyance was signed by defendants Nos. 1 and 2 for themselves and on behalf of their minor brothers. It transpired later that defendant No. 2 also was a minor at the time. The validity of the sale-deed has been attacked on three grounds, viz., (i) that plaintiff fraudulently induced them to sign it by misrepresenting that it was a mortgage-deed, (ii) that defendants Nos. 3 to 5 were minor pupils of the plaintiff and were not aware of the transaction, and (iii) that plaintiff being a phongyi is divested of all worldly things which are not meant for religious purposes and so has no right of possession over the suit house and site.

As regards the first ground the learned Township Judge held that no fraud has been proved. As regards the second ground the learned Judge expressed an opinion that there is no law at the present day which says that monks are not allowed to buy and sell houses though the ideal Bhikkhu would shun to do such things. As regards the third ground the learned Judge was of opinion that the sale was for the benefit of the minors and so was binding on them. He accordingly decreed the suit.

On appeal to the District Court of Amherst the learned Additional Judge accepted the findings of the lower Court regarding the first and the third grounds of attack, but, as regards the question of minority, the learned Judge, relying upon the Privy Council ruling of Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (1) held that the contract was void so far as the minors were concerned. He, therefore, modified the decree of the lower Court by granting a decree to the extent of a fifth share in the suit house and land. Against that modified decree this second appeal has been filed.

As regards the question of fraud and minority I need only say that the decision of the lower Appellate Court on those points is perfectly correct. As regards the remaining question as to whether a Buddhist monk is prohibited by his personal law to engage in worldly transactions it is one which entails some difficulty in answering because the case-law as it now stands is that a Buddhist monk can possess property.

It is necessary to ascertain the consequences of joining the order. It is needless to say that it has generally been accepted that a Buddhist layman embracing religious life dies a civil death; in other words he is divested of all his property of which he is possessed. That principle has been adopted by the late Mr. Burgess in the case of Ma Pwe v. Maung Myat Tha (2). The learned Judicial Commissioner referred to the Buddhist Scriptures. At the same time the learned Judicial Commissioner admitted that in modern days Burman Buddhist monks' vows of poverty sit lightly on them. He further observed: "There can be no doubt that such relaxation of ancient austerity has to be confined within reasonable limits, and that it does not extend to the renunciation of the world involved in the formal adoption of religious life. The service of God and Mammon cannot be combined. To retain the sensual enjoyments of the secular and at the same time to pretend to the sanctity of the sacred life would be to turn the whole thing into a sham and farce, and would be unquestionably offensive to popular sentiment."

I fully endorse his view. However, it cannot be denied that a Buddhist monk can receive gifts even in the form of poggalika as distinguished from sanghika. A sanghika gift is a gift made to the Order in general or to the sangha residing in a particular locality. A poggalika gift is a gift made to an individual monk. It is a personal gift, but it must be remembered that it is a religious gift made with a view to providing the monk with his requirements as a monk. So it has been held that a monk can possess property; but, this, in my opinion, should not be taken to mean that a monk can enter into worldly transactions as an ordinary layman for his personal profit. It is true that s. 409 of the Kinwun Mingyi's Digest lays down a rule of disposal regarding property acquired by a monk by agriculture or trade, or by usury. But this does not mean that such acquisition is in accordance with his personal law. In my opinion Jurists anticipated such cases where monks might disregard their own personal law and acquire property by employing themselves as laymen. The Jurists accordingly laid down that such property which was of a nonreligious character should go to the monks' own relations, and not to the Order. Evidently the Jurists treated such rahan as ordinary laymen so far as the property was concerned because a true rahan ceases to have any relations in the world; he no longer addresses his parents as father and mother but would address them in the same way as he would any other layman or laywoman by such epithets as "taga" and "tagama."

Evidently, the case of U. Tilawka v. Nga Shwe Kan (3), decided by the late Mr. McColl, Judicial Commissioner, Upper Burma, has not been brought to the notice of the learned Additional District Judge. In that case a Buddhist monk brought a suit for redemption of a piece of paddy land alleged to have been mortgaged by him as a monk. The learned Judge rightly applied the personal law of the monk and that personal law is the Vinaya. The Vinaya, no doubt, prohibits a monk from engaging in worldly transactions as an ordinary layman as will be seen from ss. 18, 19 and 20 of Patimokkha Nissaggiya Pakittiya Dhamma. They are as follows:—

(i) "Whatsoever Bhikku shall receive gold or silver or get someone to receive it for him or allow it to be kept in deposit for him—that is Pakittiya offence involving forfeiture."

(ii) "Whatsoever Bhikku shall engage in any one of the various transactions in which silver is used—that is Pakittiya offence involving forfeiture."

(iii) "Whatsoever Bhikku shall engage in any one of the various kinds of buying and selling—that is Pakittiya offence involving forfeiture."

There can be no doubt that monks should regulate their lives according to the Vinaya and backslidings should be discouraged. In the case of Maung Shwe Ton v. Maung Tun Lin (4) the Thathanabaing of Mandalay expressed the opinion that when a matter concerning rahans involved a dispute about property between monks themselves or between monks and laymen, the case coming before an ecclesiastical tribunal, the case is decided according to the rules laid down in the Vinaya. It is observed in Nga Po Thin v. U Thi Hla (5), that although in any case the strict rules of Vinaya are sometimes departed from by many monks yet there are other monks who try to conform to them as well as the times would permit. It is also observed in Maung Shwe Ton's case (4) that members of the Holy Order in Burma still profess to regulate their lives by the strict rules of the Vinaya although backslidings and eccentricities on the part of individual monks are sometimes tolerated.

As regards these backslidings and eccentricities of some individual monks, I agree with the late Mr. McColl that we should enforce the resolution of the venerable Bhikkus passed at the first Council held after the death of Buddha. The resolution was that none of the precepts laid down by Lord Buddha should be abolished or altered. Again at the subsequent Council held at Vesali where 700 Bhikkus were present it was resolved that the rule as to gold and silver should not be relaxed and that a precedent was no excuse for doing what was forbidden. In the course of his judgment the learned Judicial Commissioner mentioned a case as showing to what length some monks are willing to go in disregard of their vows. He referred to a case where a Buddhist monk brought a suit in the District Court of Mandalay for restitution of conjugal rights, though sexual intercourse is the first of the four cardinal sins which a monk can commit. The learned Judge also made the following pertinent remark:—

"A Buddhist monk who has taken vows of poverty and who professes to have abandoned the pleasures of the world, bringing a suit for his own personal profit is not an edifying spectacle, and I do not think such monks have any cause for complaint, if their vows are regarded by the Courts in a more serious light than they regard them themselves."

From the texts already quoted above it is clear that a Bhikku shall not engage in any transaction in which silver is used, and he shall not engage in any transaction of buying and selling. The case here is that the monk borrowed Rs. 100 and bought the house; he then brought a suit out of which this appeal has arisen to recover possession of the house. His conduct is what is prohibited by the Vinaya, his personal law.

We have seen that a layman on entering the Order dies a civil death and becomes divested of all his property possessed by him as a layman. This is because he has renounced the world. How can it be logical to hold that a person civilly dead can employ himself as a layman and enter into worldly transactions while he is still in the Order? He professes to regulate his life in accordance with the Vinaya, a Code of discipline for the Sangha and that Vinaya clearly prohibits such conduct.

Section 23 of the Contract Act lays down that the consideration or object of an agreement is lawful unless forbidden by law or is of such a nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provisions of any law, or if the Court regards it as immoral, or opposed to public policy; and that every agreement of which the object or consideration is unlawful is void.

I am of opinion that the transaction in the present case falls within the scope and purview of this section. There can be no doubt that the transaction offends the personal law of Buddhist monks and is immoral. I, therefore, set aside the decree of the District Court and dismiss the suit; each party to bear his own costs.

Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 108, cl. (15)— Suit for profits—Lambardar liable to account on basis of demand—Simultaneous liability to pay interest, whether justified.

A lambardar is not liable to account to the co-sharer on the basis of demands and also to pay interest on the arrears of profits. [p. 204, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Assistant Collector, First Class, Bahraich, dated the 15th July, 1926.

Mr. M. Wasim, for Mr. Ali Zaheer, for the Appellant.

Mr. Ali Mohammed, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is the defendant's appeal from the decree of an Assistant Collector of the First Class of Bahraich, dated the 15th of July, 1926.

The defendant is the lambardar in a mahal called Mahal Jagatpur. The plaintiff is a co-sharer in that mahal. The defendant has also a share in the same mahal.

The suit, out of which this appeal arises, is one under cl. (15) of s. 108 of the Oudh Rent Act, 1886, for a share of profits. The defendant has failed to produce any account of the collections and disbursements, which he made in the capacity of a lambardar.

The Court below has decreed the plaintiff's claim on the basis of gross demand. The question in appeal is whether it has done so rightly. The points which arose for the purpose of deciding that question were referred to a Full Bench* by the order dated the 27th of April, 1927.

They were as follows:—

1. Can a Court decree to a co-sharer, who claims his share of profits from a lambardar under s. 108, cl. (15), Oudh Rent Act, 1886, not only his share of profits actually collected, but also his share of the profits which have remained uncollected owing to the negligence or misconduct of the lambardar?

"2 (a). Is a lambardar under a legal or an equitable obligation to maintain accounts of his collections and expenses of the joint estate?

"(b) If the answer to (a) is in the affirmative then if the lambardar fails to fulfil the obligation, can he, when accounts are taken, in a suit under s. 108, cl. (15), be made liable for the gross rental?"

Reference has now returned to us with the answers given to the questions by the Full Bench and we have now to decide the appeal in accordance with those answers.

The Full Bench has approved of the decision of one of us in the case of Sheo Dayal Singh v. Ram Narain (1).

Mr. Muhammad Wasim, on behalf of the appellant, has stated that he is not in a position to contest the view that the defendant-appellant is guilty of some negligence and that that negligence amounts to a breach of fiduciary duties imposed on him in the character of a lambardar. This is in accordance with the decision in the case just now mentioned but he argues on the authority of the same decision that the defendant lambardar is not liable to account to the plaintiff on the basis of demands and also to pay interest on the arrears of profits. This contention must be accepted as sound. Mr. Wasim further says that the defendant may be charged with interest and not be made liable to give a share to the plaintiff on the basis of demands.

(1) 104 Ind. Cas. 2; 4 O. W. N. 694; A. I. R. 1927 Oudh 332.

It might have been possible for us to accept the last mentioned argument of Mr. Wasim had his client taken the trouble of proving what was the amount of collections actually made by him. He has given no evidence either oral or documentary in this behalf. The Courts below have also not given any finding as to what the actual collections were. On the merits of the case, therefore, we are unable to accede to Mr. Wasim's argument.

It follows, however, from what we have already stated that the defendant-appellant should not be saddled with interest also when the decree awards to the plaintiff his share in the profits of the mahal on the basis of gross rental.

We accordingly allow this appeal and modify the decree of the Court below to this extent only that the decree of that Court in so far as it awards any interest to the plaintiff for the past or future is set aside. The rest of the decree is maintained. Costs which might be commensurate with the interest allowed by the Court below shall not be allowed to the plaintiff in that Court. The decree of the Court below in the matter of costs in other respects shall also hold good. As to the costs in this Court we direct that each party shall bear his own costs.

Madras District Municipalities Act (V of 1920), s. 9 (1)—Election becoming infructuous on account of irregularities—Retiring Councillor, whether entitled to claim seat.

Section 9 (1) of the Madras District Municipalities Act applies only to cases where a valid election has been held under s. 8 of the Act, [p. 206, col. 1.]

Where an election becomes infructuous and is dropped on account of irregularities in the conduct of the preliminaries the retiring Councillor cannot be deemed to have been re-elected under s. 9 (1) of the Act. [ibid.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Coimbatore, in Civil Appeal No. 288 of 1926, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Coimbatore, in O. S. No. 1911 of 1926.

Dr. S. Swaminathan, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. M. Krishnaswamy Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case may be shortly stated as follows :—In anticipation of a vacancy to occur in the Municipal Council of the Coimbatore Municipality, the Chairman originally fixed the 29th of August, 1926, for receiving nominations, the 1st September for the scrutiny of the nominations and the 9th September for the taking of the poll. Two candidates sent letters to the Chairman purporting to withdraw their candidature on the 7th September. Under r. 8 of the Rules made by the Local Government these letters do not amount to proper withdrawals. On the 8th September the Chairman erroneously regarding the letters as proper withdrawals made a declaration that no poll was necessary. He apparently detected his mistake, dropped the proceedings and started fresh proceedings for election. He fixed the 23rd of September for receiving nominations and the 4th October for polling. On the 1st October, the then sitting member declared his willingness to serve but the Chairman refusing to accept this as one which the member was entitled to make at that stage, started fresh election proceedings calling for nominations on the 8th October. On the 4th October this plaintiff was filed for a declaration that the plaintiff continued as a valid member under the Act. Both the lower Courts have decided against the plaintiff and he files this second appeal.

The point to be decided turns on the meaning to be given to s. 9, cl. (1) of the Act which runs as follows :—

“If from any cause no Councillor is elected at an ordinary election held under the previous section, the retiring Councillor shall, if willing to serve, be deemed to have been re-elected.”

Dr. Swaminathan, the learned Counsel for the plaintiff, argues that we ought to hold that an election has been held under the preceding section but that it ended in no Councillor being elected. He lays stress on the words 'If from any cause no Councillor is elected' for his contention that the section covers all cases where elections have been contemplated but on account of various irregularities committed by the Chairman or by others no Councillor was elected. We are unable to agree with this conclusion. The section seems to apply only to cases where a valid election has been held under the previous section. The scheme of the Act shows that an election begins by the Chairman fixing certain dates and ends with the date on which the polling is fixed. If serious irregularities going to the root of the proceedings happen in the course of such election it may be that the election must be considered void, and in such cases it cannot be said that an election has been held within the meaning of s. 9 (1). In the present case the existing member was anxious to declare his intention to continue as a member on the 1st October, that is three days before the date fixed for the polling. One must wait until the lapse of that day to be able to say that an election has been held.

Where one does not wait until that day it cannot be said that an election has been held. The result is no body is in a position to state on the 1st October that a valid election has been held and that no Councillor has been elected. It is not necessary for us to consider the remarks made by the learned District Judge on the language of s. 9. It is enough to say that we do not think that the words 'an ordinary election held under the previous section' are redundant. There may be cases where an election may be properly held without any Councillor being elected. A simple case is where all the voters for some reason or other do not go to the polling station to exercise their franchise. Other cases may be conceived. We agree with the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judges in considering that this is not a case to which s. 9 applies.

The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Second appeal from the decision of the Assistant Judge, Satara, in Appeal No. 489 of 1924, confirming the decree of the Subordinate Judge at Islampur, in Suit No. 292 of 1917.

FACTS.—Andu died leaving his widow Chandra, daughter Sundra and a sister's son Rama. Andu, by his Will left his properties to Rama. Rama's father set up Rama's claim under the Will on Andu's death. The matter was referred to arbitration. Chandra admitted the Will before the arbitrators but said that the Will was to take effect if Rama married Sundra. An award was made accordingly and a decree passed thereon. The parties subsequently fell out. Rama sued on June 21, 1917, for possession and Chandra filed a cross-suit on July 10, 1918, for having the award declared invalid. Chandra's suit was dismissed finally on the 13th July, 1920. Chandra adopted a son Ravji. Rama's suit was decreed in his favour. Chandra and Ravji appealed.

JUDGMENT.

Marten, C. J.—[His Lordship stated the facts and proceeded:—] That brings me to the position which Counsel for the appellants has put before us. Substantially he says the widow had no right to compromise the claim to the estate as against the adopted son, that no matter that the adopted son was not then in existence or at any rate had not been adopted, the true view of the law is she could not make any admission binding on a future reversioner; she could only litigate a case to the bitter end and have the decision in effect of the highest Court. That proposition to my mind is absolutely unsound in law. We fortunately have a decision by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Ramsurran Prasad v. Shyam Kumari (1) and there it is thus stated (page 346*) "Bearing this in mind their Lordships will proceed to consider whether an alienation, which is the result of a compromise, or the mode by which a compromise is carried into effect, should, if the compromise be reasonable and prudent, and for the interest of the estate, fall within the power of the holder of a Hindu woman's estate, either as being an alienation which is deemed to be induced by necessity, or as being in a parallel position to an alienation induced by necessity. It may be observed at once that the argument which would refuse authority to compromise in any case would have very extreme consequences. A Hindu woman might be party to a litigation concerning considerable immovable property, might be successful in the first Court and be threatened with an appeal, and have then a suggestion from the adversary that if she would part with a single item of property or a few bighas he would let the judgment stand. She would have if the argument were sound to refuse the suggested compromise, and be prepared to fight the case up to the Privy Council. Or it might be put in another way. Her opponent could never suggest a compromise, because he would know that any compromise would be upset. It would be very undesirable in the interests of property owners that this extreme doctrine should be upheld, and their Lordships, after consideration of the authorities that have been cited to them, are glad to find that they are not driven to any such extreme position."

The argument here is that though the widow admitted the Will, she had no legal authority to do so. I think the answer is found in the sentences which I have just read.

If then she had the power, the course she took here was apparently a reasonable one in the interests of the estate and the parties affected. I do not propose to go into all the authorities that have been cited to us. The question of family arrangements has been dealt with also by their Lordships in Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (2) and Hiran Bibi v. Sohan Bibi (3). Further we have had a well-known case cited to us, Katama Natchier v. Raja of Shivagunga (4), where their Lordships have laid down the proposition that where in a litigation properly entered into and properly conducted the estate is represented by a Hindu widow, and certain results are arrived at, that result may be binding on the reversioners. The subsequent cases on same point will be found in Vaithialinga Mudaliar v. Srirangath Anni (5), where the previous authorities are reviewed. Consequently, I may only notice in passing the decision of our own Courts in Ghelabai v. Bai Javer (6) and Subbammal v. Avudaiyammal (7).

It is, however, said that there are two decisions by our own Court in Natvarlal Maneklal v. Baichanchal (8) and Rama Santu v. Daji Naru (9) which prevent the present decree award from being relied on. The former is a decision by Sir Norman Macleod and Mr. Justice Heaton. The judgment is given by Mr. Justice Heaton, and if one looks at the facts there, one finds this, that the widow compromised a claim to recover property by partition. In this manner she gave up the claim to the property and she took Rs. 165 a year for life for herself and a reversionary grant of Rs. 30 a year for her daughter who was not a party to the suit. The Court there thought that that compromise was not one which could fairly be regarded as binding on the reversioner. The facts of that particular case we are not concerned with in the present case, but in so far as there are observations either in Natvarlal Maneklal v. Baichanchal (8) or in Rama Santu v. Daji

Naru (9) to suggest that under no circumstances can any admission of fact by a Hindu widow operate as against her reversioners, however bona fide made, all I have to say is that, in my opinion, those observations are inconsistent with what I have already quoted from the Privy Council decision of Ramsumran Prasad v. Shyam Kumari (1).

In my opinion that is, therefore, sufficient to dispose of the case. I would hold that the matter was fairly and bona fide considered in 1908, and it was not till many years afterwards when the parties began to quarrel that it was suggested that this Will was not a proper Will. Under those circumstances I do not think it necessary to go into the further point as to whether the decree in the widow's suit against her would be binding on the reversioner, the adopted son. It is said that that decree was passed on limitation and not on merits, but, however that may be, it is material to observe that the widow failed in getting the decree award set aside.

The point was also taken under s. 11 of the Civil Procedure Code that inasmuch as Rama's suit was started first, no decision in the widow's suit could be regarded as res judicata. But that argument was advanced in forgetfulness of the express provisions of s. 11, Explanation I, which expressly provides that the material date is not the date of the suit, but the date of the decision. Therefore, there is no substance in that point.

On the whole I consider that the learned Judge came to a correct conclusion in the present case, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Crump, J.—I agree.

*Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 73, 115—
Order under s. 73—Revision—Interference.*

The High Court will not interfere in revision with an order for rateable distribution under s. 73 of the Civil Procedure Code unless it is obviously wrong.

Petition; under s. 115 of Act V of 1908 and s. 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the First Additional Subordinate Judge, Madura, in E. A. No. 43 of 1925, in E. P. No. 82 of 1924, in O. S. No. 1 of 1922, on the file of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Dindigul.

Mr. T. M. Ramaswami Iyer, for the Petitioner.

Mr. K. S. Ramabhadra Iyer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a revision petition against an order under s. 73, Civil Procedure Code. It may be that if the order of the Court is obviously wrong and if one can say that the proper order should be in favour of the petitioner, we may interfere in civil revision petition; vide Sri Krishna Doss v. Chandook Chand (1). But the matter here is not obvious. The question turns on the meaning of the words "receipt of the assets" in a case where the decree-holder has been allowed to bid and to set off. The petitioner relies on Mohan Lal v. Amar Nath (2). The respondent relies on Arunachellam Chetty v. Somasundaram Chetty (3).

In these circumstances, we think we ought not to decide the matter in revision. The petitioner has got another remedy by a regular suit.

The petition is dismissed but under the circumstances of the case, without costs.

FARDUNJI C. GORA—ACCUSED—

RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 21—Bombay Government Rules, rr. 9, 10—Bench of Honorary Magistrates—Difference of opinion—Dissenting judgment, whether should form part of record. Although under rr. 9 and 10 of the rules framed by the Bombay Government under s. 21 of the Criminal Procedure Code, where there is a difference between two Honorary Magistrates composing a Bench, the opinion of the Chairman prevails, the dissenting Magistrate has a right to have his judgment and finding recorded, and his dissenting judgment should, therefore, form part of the record in the case. [p. 210, col. 1; p. 211, col. 2.]

Criminal appeal by the Government of Bombay, against an order of acquittal passed by a Bench of Honorary. Presidency Magistrates, Girgaum, Bombay.

FACTS.—The accused were tried under s. 12 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act, IV of 1887, by a Bench of two Honorary Magistrates, Mr. Kapadia, Chairman and Mr. Turkhud, Girgaum, Bombay. They differed in opinion, Mr. Kapadia holding that the accused should be acquitted while the other holding that they should be convicted. The opinion of the Chairman being senior prevailed, and the accused were consequently acquitted. The judgment of Mr. Turkhud was not read, not any mention of it was made in the Chairman's judgment. The Government of Bombay appeals against the order of acquittal, and the first question that arises in the case is whether the judgment of the dissenting Honorary Magistrate forms part of the record.

Mr. Velinker, for the Accused.

Mr. P. B. Shingne, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Patkar, J.—[His Lordship after stating the above facts proceeded:—]

Rule 9 of the rules framed by the Local Government under s. 21 of the Code of Criminal Procedure says:—

"The Chairman shall conduct the proceedings of the Court, but every member of a Bench shall have a voice in the determination of all points arising in any case before the Bench and in the finding and sentence. When opinions are divided the decision of the majority shall prevail; and when the Bench is equally divided the Chairman shall have a second or casting vote."

Rule 10 of the said rules says:—

"The Chairman of a Bench shall ordinarily record the evidence (when necessary) and the judgment and/or sentence of the Court; but such duty may, with the Chairman's consent, be performed by any one of his colleagues, or, at his dictation, by the Judicial Clerk of the Court. If the last course be adopted each record of judgment or sentence shall be signed by the Chairman of the Bench."

It is argued on behalf of the accused that when the Bench is equally divided in opinion, the Chairman shall have a second or casting vote and that the Chairman shall record the judgment of the Court, and that the rules contemplate that the only judgment of the Court shall be the judgment signed by the Chairman, and though the dissenting Magistrate may have a voice in the determination of all the points arising in the case, his judgment does not form part of the record. It is argued on behalf of the Crown that though the Chairman may have a second or casting vote and the prevailing judgment of the Court may be the judgment of the Chairman, still as the dissenting Magistrate has a voice in the determination of all the points arising in the case, his judgment forms part of the record of the case.

Rule 9 which directs that when a Bench consisting of two members is equally divided in opinion, the decision of the Chairman shall prevail, is apparently not quite consistent with other provisions of the Code. Under s. 429 of the Criminal Procedure Code, "when the Judges composing the Court of Appeal are equally divided in opinion, the case, with their opinions thereon, shall be laid before another Judge of the same Court, and such Judge, after such hearing (if any) as he thinks fit, shall deliver his opinion, and the judgment or order shall follow such opinion." To the same effect are the provisions of s. 439 and s. 378 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It might be said on the one hand that the rule investing the Chairman with a second or casting vote when the Bench consists of two members, is arbitrary and inconsistent with natural justice.

and that the guilt or innocence of the accused should not depend upon chance and choice of the Chairman, and that such an arbitrary and apparently unjust rule should not have the force of law. On the other hand the rule is consistent with cl. 35 of the Amended Letters Patent of 1865. With regard to a similar rule in Calcutta there was conflict of judicial opinion on the point as to whether it was inconsistent with the Code, but there was unanimous disapproval of the rule, and the rule was subsequently modified by the Local Government. See Henry Wakefield v. Haran Sardar (1), Lal Behari Chuckerbutty v. Jalukhan (2), and Kailash Chandra Indu v. Kali Prosunno Roy (3). I am not prepared to say that the rule is ultra vires as being inconsistent with the Criminal Procedure Code though it is desirable that the rule should be modified. We have, therefore, to construe the rule as it is, and under r. 9 the Chairman shall have a casting vote and the judgment of the Court, according to r. 10, will be the judgment of the Chairman who, according to r. 9, has two votes and the dissenting Magistrate will have one vote. Nevertheless the dissenting Magistrate is contemplated by r. 9 to have a voice in the determination of all the points arising in any case before the Bench and in the finding and sentence as a member of the Bench, and has a right to record his judgment and his finding. I think that the dissenting judgment of the Honorary Magistrate even if the Bench consists of two members, should form part of the record; otherwise the Appellate Court would not be in a position to know whether the judgment of the lower Court is a concurrent judgment of two Judges or is a judgment of the Chairman dissented from by the other member of the Bench. This view is consistent with the intention of the Legislature as expressed in s. 265, cl. 4, of the Criminal Procedure Code: "If the Bench differ in opinion, any dissentient member may write a separate judgment." I think, therefore, that the judgment of Mr. Turkhud does form part of the record of this case.

On the merits, according to the definition in s. 3 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambing Act IV of 1887, "any transaction by which a person in any capacity whatever employs another in any capacity whatever or engages for another in any capacity whatever to wager or bet whether with such licensee or with any other person shall be deemed to be 'gaming'" and under s. 12 "a Police Officer may apprehend—any person found gaming in any public street, etc." According to the prosecution, accused No. 1 engaged his cook, accused No. 2, to wager or bet with some other person. According to the defence, accused No. 1 did not engage accused No. 2 to wager or bet, but that accused No. 1 wrote out on a piece of paper the horses which were likely to win, and that accused No. 1 gave the tips to accused No. 2. The answer to the question whether accused Nos. 1 and 2 were gaming would depend upon the simple question of fact whether accused No. 1 passed Re. 1-4-0 to accused No. 2. That is a question of fact which would be decided on the evidence in the case. Both the Magistrates are divided in opinion and, though the judgment of the Chairman is to be considered as the prevailing judgment of the Court, it is clear that it is not entitled to greater weight than that of the dissenting Honorary Magistrate. [His Lordship referred to the evidence and continued:—]

On the whole, I am satisfied on the evidence that accused No. 1 passed Re. 1-4-0 to accused No. 2. Both the accused were, therefore, found gaming on a public street and are proved to have committed an offence under s. 12 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act IV of 1887.

I would, therefore, allow the appeal, convict the accused and sentence accused No. 1 to pay a fine of Rs. 10 and accused No. 2 to pay a fine of Rs. 5, in default to undergo one week's simple imprisonment.

Baker, J.—This is an appeal by the Government of Bombay against an order of acquittal passed by the Honorary Presidency Magistrate's Court, Girgaum, Bombay, in a case in which the accused No. 1, Fardunji C. Gora and accused No. 2 Sebastian Menezes were charged with an offence under s. 12 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act IV of 1887.

Before dealing with the facts a point of law arises in connection with the trial by the Honorary Presidency Magistrates' Court. The case was heard by a Bench of two Magistrates, Mr. P. P. Kapadia, Chairman and Mr. B. S. Turkhud. They differed in opinion, Mr. Kapadia, holding that the accused should be acquitted, Mr. Turkhud holding that they should be convicted. The opinion of the Chairman as the senior prevailed, and the accused were accordingly acquitted and the present appeal by Government is against that order of acquittal. Both Magistrates wrote separate judgments, but the judgment of Mr. Turkhud was not read, nor was any mention of it made in the Chairman's judgment. Mr. Turkhud objected and the Chairman, therefore, added a postscript to his judgment to the following effect:—

(1) 8 C. W. N. 862; 1 Cr. L. J. 842.

(2) 9 C. W. N. cclxix (269).

(3) 10 C. W. N. 642; 3 Cr. L. J. 409; 3 C. L. J. 492 (F. B.).

"I understand from my colleague Mr. B. S. Turkhud that he differs from me both on facts as well as law but I being the Chairman I exercise the privilege of the casting vote under rules for the guidance for the Benches of the Honorary Presidency Magistrates. The above judgment is, therefore, the judgment of the Court. I am not bound under the rules to record this note of dissent. I do so because I am asked by my colleague to record it. This should not be, however, taken as a precedent in future."

The question, therefore, is, whether when there is a difference of opinion between the members of a Bench this fact should be noted in the record. When it was brought to the notice of the High Court that Mr. Turkhud had written a dissentient judgment, which did not form part of the record his judgment was called for and has been printed along with the record. The rules on the subject are rr. 9 and 10 of the rules for the guidance of the Benches of Honorary Presidency Magistrates, published under G. R. J. D. No. 2536 of May 19, 1904 and subsequently modified by G. R. J. D. No. 3801 of July 29, 1905 and G. R. J. D. No. 1653 of March 28, 1908. These rules will be found in the Manual for the use of the Honorary Presidency Magistrates of Bombay at pages 2 and 3. [His Lordship quoted rr. 9 and 10 and proceeded:—]

It will thus appear that no express provision is made by the rules for the record of the dissent of any member of the Bench. In the present case there were two Magistrates, who disagreed. Under r. 9 the Chairman's opinion prevailed. His judgment, as originally written contains no reference to the fact that his colleague differed from him; and that the finding of acquittal was based on his second or casting vote.

In my judgment it is necessary that the fact of the Bench being divided in opinion, and the decision being the decision of the majority, or in case of equal division, of the Chairman having given a second or casting vote, ought to form part of the record. This is necessary for the information of an Appellate or Revisional Court, and I am, therefore, of opinion that in all such cases the existence of the dissent should be recorded and that the rules should be amended accordingly. It is still more necessary when, as in the present case, the dissenting member of the Bench has written a separate judgment. [His Lordship discussed the facts and proceeded:—]

Under s. 3 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act, any transaction by which a person in any capacity whatever employs another person in any capacity whatever or engages for another in any capacity whatever to wager or bet whether with the racecourse licensee or with any other person shall be deemed to be "gaming". This answers the view taken by the Chairman of the Bench that no offence was committed by accused No. 2. Under s. 12 gaming in a public street is made punishable with fine and imprisonment. Both the accused are, therefore, guilty of an offence under s. 12 of the Act—the slip and money having been handed over in a public street. The offence in this particular case is of a trivial nature, especially in view of the fact that if the accused No. 1 had handed the slip and the money over to accused No. 2 in a private room inside the Hotel instead of in the street outside it, no offence would have been committed.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of acquittal should be set aside and the accused convicted under s. 12 of the Act. As regards the sentence, it will be sufficient if accused No. 1 is fined Rs. 10 and accused No. 2 Rs. 5, in default seven days' simple imprisonment.

Criminal appeal from a decision of the Sessions Judge, Monghyr, dated the 2nd February, 1927.

Mr. M. K. Mukharji, for the Appellant.

Mr. C. M. Agarwala, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, J.—Agreeing with all four assessors the learned Sessions Judge of Monghyr has sentenced the appellant Zahuri Sahu to rigorous imprisonment for eighteen months for an offence under s. 471 of the Indian Penal Code. Agreeing with three of the assessors the learned Judge has sentenced the appellant to rigorous imprisonment for eighteen months and a fine of Rs. 100 for an offence under s. 209 of the Indian Penal Code; the terms of imprisonment are to run concurrently.

It is found by the learned Judge that on the 20th November, 1925, Zahuri instituted a suit in the Court of the Small Cause Court Munsif at Begusarai upon a hand-note against one Badri Gope. Badri Gope contended that the hand-note was a forgery and that the thumb-impression on it was not his thumb-impression. The hand-note was sent to a fingerprint expert together with the admitted impressions of Badri's thumb in both hands. The expert found that the impression upon the hand-note did not tally with those taken for Badri. When the Small Cause Court case came on for trial, Zahuri absented himself and the suit was dismissed for default. Thereafter Badri applied for the prosecution of Zahuri and notice was issued upon him to show cause why he should not be prosecuted. Zahuri did show cause and his defence was that he had never filed the plaint nor the hand-note and that the thumb-impression on the verification to the plaint was not his. The Munsif directed a prosecution nevertheless, with the result that Badri was tried in the Session Court at Monghyr and was convicted and sentenced as stated before.

Now the case seems to be proved beyond doubt. It is established by the evidence of the finger-print expert that the hand-note is a forgery and that Badri never put his thumb impression on it. The expert deposes that Badri's thumb-impression is of a different type to that found upon the hand-note and that the number of deltas also differ.

The substantial question in this case is whether the defence that Zahuri never appeared in the Civil Court at all and that some other person impersonated and caused a plaint to be filed in the Small Cause Court can be accepted. Upon this point we have the evidence, first of all, of Jageshwar Prasad, who was the Pleader who filed the plaint, and his clerk, Ajodhya Prasad, who caused the plaint to be prepared and verified; then there is also the evidence of the Pleader Babu Baidyanatheswar Prasad who appeared for Zahuri in the miscellaneous proceedings in which he was called upon to show cause against his prosecution. Babu Jageshwar admits that he had never seen him before the day on which Zahuri came to file the plaint, but he had opportunities of seeing this man in the course of a civil suit and he deposes that Zahuri was the man who brought the hand-note. Ajodhya Prasad similarly had many opportunities of seeing Zahuri and he too deposes that Zahuri was the man who brought the hand-note and that the verification upon the plaint was drawn up by some one under Zahuri's instructions. He himself did not see the verification drawn up nor the thumb-impression put upon the verification. He says he told Zahuri to get it done. Zahuri was asked in Court whether he was willing to give his thumb-impression for comparison with the thumb-impression upon the plaint and he declined. I think, in these circumstances, it is open to the Court to draw an inference adverse to him.

Our attention has been drawn to Bazari Hajam v. Emperor (1) in which there are observations by one of the Judges constituting the Division Bench to the effect that it is improper to take forcibly a thumb-impression from an accused person in a criminal proceeding. The decision, however, did not turn upon that point, and the question whether it is proper or not to ask the accused to give his thumb impression was not clearly raised. On the other hand, it was decided by a Full Bench in the High Court at Rangoon in Emperor v. Nga Tun Hlaing (2) that the Court has power under s. 73 of the Indian Evidence Act to direct an accused person, present in Court, to make his finger impression for the purpose described in that section and that s. 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure relates only to the oral questioning of the accused.

Section 5 of Act XXXIII of 1920 which is an Act to authorise the taking of measurements and photographs of convicts and others lays down.

"If a Magistrate is satisfied that, for the purposes of any investigation or proceeding under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, it is expedient to direct any person to allow his measurements or photograph to be taken, he may make an order to that effect, and in that case the person to whom the order relates shall be produced or shall attend at the time and place specified in the order and shall allow his measurements or photograph to be taken, as the case may be, by a Police Officer."

In my opinion there was quite sufficient legal authority for the Court to ask the accused person whether he would consent to have his thumb impression taken for comparison with the thumb-impression upon the plaint. But this is not all. Babu Baidyanatheswar Prasad, the Vakil who appeared for the accused in the miscellaneous proceedings, deposes that the accused was the man who came to answer the notice issued by the Court. There the accused denied that he was the person who had filed the hand-note or the plaint. Babu Baidyanatheswar had several opportunities of seeing the accused and his evidence cannot be lightly brushed aside.

The result is that, in my opinion, the assessors were fully justified, upon the evidence, in believing the case for the prosecution and the learned Sessions Judge's order must, therefore, be affirmed. The conviction under s. 203 of the Indian Penal Code for making a false claim fraudulently and under s. 471 of the Indian Penal Code for dishonestly using as genuine a forged hand-note, is upheld. There is no doubt that the accused being himself the plaintiff knew of the fraudulent nature of the claim and of the fraudulent nature of the hand-note. In these circumstances the convictions under both sections are correct and the sentences are not unduly severe.

The appeal is dismissed.

Criminal appeal against the judgment of the Sessions Judge, Rai Bareli, dated the 12th September, 1927.

Mr. J. Jackson, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. K. Ghosh, Government Pleader, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Raza, J.—Ram Lal, a Brahman of Dumtaha, District Rae Bareli, has been convicted by the learned Sessions Judge of Rae Bareli of having murdered Manna Pasi of Misra-khera, hamlet of Dumtaha, on the 18th January, 1927. He has been sentenced to death subject to confirmation by this Court. He appeals and the reference in confirmation is also before us.

The accused was committed for trial to the Sessions Court on a charge under s. 304, Indian Penal Code, but the learned Sessions Judge amended the charge and convicted the accused under s. 302, Indian Penal Code.

The facts as found by the learned Sessions Judge are these :—

The accused beat the deceased with a heavy lathi and caused his death. The deceased was unarmed at that time and the accused went on ill-treating him with the lathi after he had become insensible. The accused pretended to think that Manna was shamming and had him carried into the village slung to a pole saying that he would chalan him. When Manna died the accused absconded.

The accused's defence in this case was that he found Manna stealing sarson from his field. He (accused) went up to Manna quietly and tried to catch him. Manna then attacked him with a hansiya. A fight ensued and in that fight he accidentally killed Manna with the lathi. He did not know that Manna was seriously hurt and had him taken into the village and wanted to chalan him. However he gave Manna up to Ohhabba, maternal uncle of Manna, on the request of the villagers. When he heard of the death of Manna he was afraid of the Police and absconded.

The principal witnesses for prosecution in this case are Manni Kori, Ghansila Pasi and Newal Kishore Brahman. I have carefully considered the evidence given by these witnesses. Manni's evidence shows simply that the accused was striking Manna with the butt of the lathi thrusting it against him. Manna tried to get up but was knocked down again. He states in his cross-examination that he saw Ram Lal strike only one lathi thrust. He says nothing as to how the quarrel arose. He states that the quarrel had started before he arrived there and that he first noticed the beating when the accused was striking the deceased who was lying on the ground. The evidence given by Ghansila and Newal Kishore shows that Ram Lal shouted 'thief, thief', and so they ran to the place of occurrence to see what was the matter. They found Ram Lal standing there with a lathi in his hand. Manna was lying in the field. Ram Lal said then and there that he had struck Manna as the latter was trying to run off after theft. Ram Lal gave Manna a pole in the belly with his lathi in their presence and told him to get up. Manna could not get up as he was unconscious. Manna was then taken to the village and Ram Lal also went there.

Manna was beaten in the field of Dayal. That field is close to the fields of Ram Lal accused and Manna deceased.

I am not prepared to agree with the finding of the learned Sessions Judge that the whole story of the accused is false. The evidence given by Ghansila and Newal Kishore shows that they saw the accused and the deceased in Dayal's field. They saw that Ram Lal had some sarson plants in his hand and there were also some sarson plants lying scattered there. It may be safely inferred from their evidence that Manna was really found stealing sarson from Ram Lal's field. He (Manna) tried to run off after theft. Ram Lal tried to catch him and struck him with his lathi. There is no reliable evidence on record to show that Manna had attacked Ram Lal with a hansiya.

The medical evidence is as follows:—

(1) Abrasion $1\frac{1}{2}'' \times \frac{1}{8}''$ along the upper and forepart of the left temporal region.

(2) Bruise $1\frac{1}{4}'' \times \frac{1}{2}''$ on the upper and anterior and inner part of the right arm with swelling on the whole of the arm. There was a large effusion of blood which was coagulated underneath the skin of the whole of the right arm.

(3) Bruise $1\frac{1}{2}'' \times \frac{1}{2}''$ on the right side and middle of the back near the spine.

There was no ligature mark on the neck. There was small effusion of blood which was coagulated underneath the scalp in the left temporal region underneath wound No. 1. Death was probably due to concussion of the brain. It was the result of the head injury described under No. 1. All the injuries could have been caused by a blunt weapon such as lathi.

There is no doubt that Ram Lal accused is responsible for the fatal injury caused to Manna. I have seen the lathi which was used by the accused in striking Manna. It is a heavy lathi. It is a highly dangerous act to beat a man upon the head with a heavy lathi. Though it is not established in this case that the act by which death was caused was done with the intention of causing death, but having regard to all the facts and circumstances of the case, I think the accused should be held to have had the knowledge that he was likely to cause death. If the offence committed by the accused in this case be held to be culpable homicide amounting to murder, his act would fall within the second or fourth clause of s. 300, Indian Penal Code. But I think the accused was not guilty of the offence of murder, but of the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder and the case falls within Exception (2) of s. 300, Indian Penal Code. The accused in the exercise of his right of private defence of property exceeded the power given to him by law and caused the death of Manna against whom he was exercising such right of private defence, without premeditation. He is, therefore, guilty of the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder punishable under s. 304, Indian Penal Code.

The result is that the appeal is allowed to the extent of altering the section of conviction from 302 to 304, Indian Penal Code. I direct that Ram Lal accused be punished with rigorous imprisonment for five years.

Hasan, J.—I entirely agree with my learned brother in his conclusion that the appellant Ram Lal is not guilty of the offence of murder, but I feel serious and have grave doubts in my mind as to whether he is guilty even of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The definition of culpable homicide which includes both culpable homicide which amounts to murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder is given in s. 299 of the Indian Penal Code. When that section is analysed it will be realised that the elements which constitute the offence of culpable homicide are expressed and explained in terms of the four explanations enacted in s. 300 of the same Code. It follows to my mind that if an act which an accused person is said to have committed does fall within any of those explanations and does not fall within any of the exceptions, the act is 'murder'; but if it does fall under one or other of those explanations and also falls within any of the exceptions enacted in s. 300, the act is one of 'culpable homicide not amounting to murder.' My learned brother thinks that the case before us might well fall within Expls. 2 and 4 and as it further falls within Exception (2) of the same section it is a case of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

It seems to me that in interpreting the several clauses or explanations in s. 300 of the Indian Penal Code aid must be taken from the illustrations enacted in that section. In this connection the first thing to be borne in mind is that the illustrations find place in the body of the section previous to the five exceptions that follow. It is further clear that before the exceptions begin and immediately preceding the illustrations the Legislature enacts the four clauses which are intended to give a complete and exhaustive definition of culpable homicide. It cannot be suggested that an act may amount to an offence of culpable homicide even if it does not fall within one or other of the clauses of s. 300. Those clauses must, therefore, be taken to define the limits and exhaustive in themselves, for the purposes of the Code, of the offence of culpable homicide. This being so, it is significant that the Legislature has enacted only as many illustrations as there are clauses to s. 300. I may here be permitted to make a digression and say that illustrations do not stand on the same footing as marginal notes. Marginal notes may not be notes enacted by the Legislature and the commonly accepted view now is that they cannot be referred to for the purpose of construing the enactment. "It is well-settled that marginal notes to the sections of an Act of Parliament cannot be referred to for the purpose of construing the Act. The contrary opinion originated in a mistake, and it has been exploded long ago. There seems to be no reason for giving the marginal notes in an Indian Statute any greater authority than the marginal notes in an English Act of Parliament." Per Lord Macnaghten in the case of Balraj Kunwar v. Jagatpal Singh (1).

On the other hand illustrations are part and parcel of enactment and it seems to me that when the Court is called upon to interpret a piece of an enactment which comprises both the substantive provision and an illustration of the same, the Court is not justified in rejecting the illustration as a guide to the interpretation of the substantive provision. In the case of Mahomed Syedol Ariffin v. Yeoh Ooi Gark (2) Lord Shaw in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee made the following observations:

(1) 31 I. A. 132 at p. 142; 26 A. 393; 8 C. W. N. 699; 1 A. L. J. 331; 7 O. C. 248; 8 Sar. P. O. J. 639 (P. C.).

"On the second point their Lordships are of opinion that in the construction of the Evidence Ordinance it is the duty of a Court of Law to accept, if that can be done, the illustrations given as being both of relevance and value in the construction of the text. The illustrations should in no case be rejected because they do not square with ideas possibly derived from another system of jurisprudence as to the law with which they or the sections deal. And it would require a very special case to warrant their rejection on the ground of their assumed repugnancy to the sections themselves. It would be the very last resort of construction to make any such assumption. The great usefulness of the illustrations, which have, although not part of the sections, been expressly furnished by the Legislature as helpful in the working and application of the Statute, should not be thus impaired."

It was suggested that there is nothing in s. 300 to support the view that a particular illustration in that section applies to any particular clause of the same section. It is true that there are no express words to that effect, but if we read the clauses and the illustrations together and the section as a whole we can say at once that a particular illustration can apply to no other but a particular clause. Thus it will be seen that ill. (a) is only applicable to the first clause of the section and similarly ill. (b), (c) and (d) are applicable to the corresponding clauses in the substantive enactment separately.

When, therefore, I read cls. 2 and 4 with the help of ill. (b) and (c) my mind gets filled up with serious doubts as to the applicability of either the one or the other of those clauses to the facts of the present case.

I do not think that it is necessary for me to pursue this matter further. I have said what I have said above only for the purpose of making it clear as to what my own views on the question of the interpretation of the provisions of s. 300 are. But if according to my judgment the appellant is not guilty of the offence punishable by s. 304 of the Indian Penal Code, he is certainly guilty of the offence punishable by s. 325 of the same Code. I, therefore, agree with my learned brother that the conviction under s. 302 should be set aside and that the appellant should be sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment and we accordingly do so.

By The Court.—We allow the appeal to the extent of altering the section of conviction from s. 302 to s. 304 or s. 325, Indian Penal Code. We direct that Ram Lal accused be punished with rigorous imprisonment for five years.

JUDGMENT.

Patkar, J.—In this case the accused were tried on a charge under s. 160 of the Indian Penal Code and were acquitted. They have been again charged under s. 61 (o) of the Bombay District Police Act IV of 1890. The accused were acquitted in the previous case as it was found that the public peace was not disturbed. The question that arises for decision is whether the acquittal in the previous case bars the present prosecution. The evidence in the present case will be exactly the same evidence that was led in the previous case. Section 403 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code says:—

"A person who has once been tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction for an offence and convicted or acquitted of such offence shall, while such conviction or acquittal remains in force not be liable to be tried again for the same offence, nor on the same facts for any other offence for which a different charge from the one made against him might have been made under s. 236, or for which he might have been convicted under s. 237."

Section 236 says:—

"If a single act or series of acts is of such a nature that it is doubtful which of several offences the facts which can be proved will constitute, the accused may be charged with having committed all or any of such offences, and any number of such charges may be tried at once, or he may be charged in the alternative with having committed some one of the said offences."

We think the facts of the present case fall under s. 236 for it was doubtful from the beginning whether the act or the series of acts committed by the accused fell under s. 160 of the Indian Penal Code or under s. 61 (o) of the Bombay District Police Act. If the public peace was disturbed, then the case fell under s. 160 of the Indian Penal Code, otherwise, it would fall under s. 61 (o) of the Bombay District Police Act. If there was a doubt from the beginning on the point as to whether public peace was disturbed, alternate charges could have been framed in the previous case under s. 160 of the Indian Penal Code and also under s. 61 (o) of the Bombay District Police Act, and the accused could have been convicted under s. 61 (o) of the Bombay District Police Act in the previous case under s. 237 of the Criminal Procedure Code. We think, therefore, that the acquittal in the previous case operates as a bar to the present prosecution.

This view is supported by the case of Manhari Chowdhuri v. Emperor (1). In that case the previous prosecution was under ss. 380 and 411, Indian Penal Code, and the accused were acquitted. There was a subsequent prosecution under s. 54-A of the Calcutta Police Act in respect of the same act, and it was held that the previous acquittal operated as a bar to the subsequent trial. At page 731* it is said:—

(1) 43 Ind. Cas. 614; 45 C. 727; 22 C. W. N. 199; 19 Cr. L. J. 193; 27 C. L. J. 434.

"The trial, in other words, will take place on the same facts, and it is not suggested that there are any additional facts to be placed before the Court. In that state of things we can see no reason why the accused should not have been charged at the previous trial, under the provisions of s. 236, with the offence for which he is now being prosecuted."

The case of Deoki Koeri v. Emperor (2) relied upon by the learned Magistrate, has no application to the facts of the present case. There the previous prosecution was for theft under s. 379 of the Indian Penal Code, and the subsequent trial was for an offence under s. 9 of the Indian Opium Act. The evidence in both the cases would be quite different. For an offence under s. 379 the essential facts to be proved were that the gunny bags in which the opium was found belonged to another person and that they were removed by the accused dishonestly without the owner's consent. Under s. 9 of the Opium Act the facts which were to be proved by the prosecution were that the accused was in possession of the opium, that the opium was crude opium and that the accused could not lawfully be in possession of such opium. The facts to be proved in the two trials would be quite distinct.

Similarly, the case of Ram Sewak Lal v. Maheshwar Singh (3) would have no application to the facts of the present case. The previous prosecution was for an offence under s. 182, and the subsequent prosecution was for defamation under s. 500 of the Indian Penal Code. The case fell under s. 235, cl. (1), and not under s. 236 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The evidence that would be led in the two trials would be quite distinct, and at page 609† it is observed:—

"Although...the finding of the Magistrate in the s. 182 case cannot be in any way allowed to prejudice the accused in the

s. 500, Indian Penal Code case, it is clear that the question of malice has not at all been tried, and the accused has not been acquitted of any charge involving malice. That is a question which has to be tried on evidence which would be irrelevant in a trial under s. 182 of the Indian Penal Code."

The test laid down is whether the evidence in both cases is the same, and the subsequent trial is on the same basis of facts falling within ss. 236 and 237 of the Criminal Procedure Code. See Queen-Empress v. Subedar Krishnappa (4). It is clear that the evidence that would be led in the present case would be exactly the same evidence which was adduced in the previous case, and an alternative charge under s. 61 (c) of the Bombay District Police Act could have been framed in the previous case.

We think, therefore, that the acquittal in the previous case operates as a bar to the present trial.

We would, therefore, make the Rule absolute and quash the proceedings.

Baker, J.—I agree.

I have no doubt that the present proceedings are clearly covered by s. 403, cl. (1), of the Criminal Procedure Code. The facts are on all fours with those in the case of Manhari Chowdhury v. Emperor (1). Both the cases quoted on the other side, namely, Deoki Koeri v. Emperor (2) and Ram Sewak Lal v. Maneshwar Singh (3) are cases where in one transaction more offences than one are committed by the same person as mentioned in cl. (1) of s. 235, and, therefore, are covered by cl. (2) of s. 403 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V. of 1898), ss. 106, 123—Duty of Court to fix date for furnishing security before sentence—Sentence, form of.

Section 123, Criminal Procedure Code, contemplates that the accused shall be separately brought up for sentence if security is not furnished, so that the Court should in its judgment fix a date for the furnishing of security, without any order for alternative imprisonment and then, if by that date accused has not furnished the security, he must appear and receive sentence.

As an accused sentenced under s. 123, Criminal Procedure Code, is entitled to be released from custody the moment he furnishes security, the Court should not pass an absolute sentence of imprisonment for a particular period, but should sentence the accused for imprisonment for a particular period or until such date within that period as the required security is furnished.

Petition, under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of the First Class Bench Magistrate, Palghat, in Survey Trial No. 1389 of 1926.

Mr. A. V. Narayanaswami Iyer, for the Petitioners.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—The order of the lower Court directing that petitioner should, in default of giving security, suffer simple imprisonment for one year, cannot be upheld on two grounds:—

(1) Section 123 contemplates that the accused shall be separately brought up for sentence if security is not furnished, so that the Court should in its judgment fix a date for the furnishing of security, without any order for alternative imprisonment and then if by that date, accused has not furnished the security, he is to appear and receive sentence under s. 123;

(2) it was wrong to fix a period of one year, since accused is entitled to be released from custody the moment he furnishes the security; the sentence ought to run: "for one year or until such date within that year as the required security be furnished."

As security appears to have been furnished in this case, no further action is called for. I do not, as at present advised, subscribe to the contention that a summary Court has no power to award under s. 123 more than three months' imprisonment.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 145, 526 (8)—Proceedings under s. 145—Application for stay for moving for transfer, maintainability of.

A party to a proceeding under s. 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code is not entitled to make an application under s. 526, cl. (8) of the Code for stay of proceedings with a view to enable the applicant to move the High Court for transfer of the case.

Mr. Sultan Ahmed, Government Advocate
(with him Mr. S. Saran), for the Opponent.

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, J.—The petitioners are the first party in a case under s. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Monghyr, Mr. Shams-ul-Huda. On the 8th February, 1927, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate held a local investigation, and he admits that in the course of that local investigation he rather lost his temper with the petitioners and used certain words with regard to some of them which perhaps were not altogether justifiable. Then on the 14th February he called upon the second party to proceed with the cross-examination of the first party's witnesses. The second party asked for a stay of proceedings under s. 526, cl. (8) of the Code of Criminal Procedure and stated that they desired to move the High Court for a transfer. The learned Magistrate refused the prayer holding that it was not bona fide and proceeded with the trial. The petitioners declined to cross-examine the witnesses on the plea that they were unprepared. The case was adjourned till the 18th and then till the 19th on which date under compulsion, it is alleged, the second party addressed the Court with regard to the merits of their case and judgment was reserved. In the meantime application had been made to this Court for action under s. 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and on the 21st February an order was issued by this Court directing the Magistrate to stay further proceedings. It appears that when the order was communicated to the learned Magistrate he had already written his judgment and signed it and that he was about to deliver it in Court. Very properly he stayed further proceedings and did not deliver the judgment.

It now appears that the Magistrate has been transferred from the district and the question is whether we should direct some other officer to deliver the judgment or order a re-trial of the case from the stage at which it was left on the 14th February.

We think on the whole that the proper course will be to direct the officer who has succeeded the learned Magistrate, or such officer as may be selected for the trial of this case by the District Magistrate, to re-call the two witnesses whom the second party declined to cross-examine on the 14th August and to proceed with the trial from that stage according to law.

A point has been taken as to whether cl. (8) of s. 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure applies to proceedings under s. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The clause as amended makes it clear that a case within the meaning of the clause includes a proceeding under s. 145; but as the clause directs that the application to the trial Court is to be made either by the Public Prosecutor or the complainant or the accused, it would seem that the parties in a proceeding under s. 145 cannot take advantage of the clause. That clause would seem to apply only to cases arising out of an offence under the Criminal Law and probably the Legislature thought that proceedings which are quasi civil in nature such as inquiries into the possession of land, do not require the exercise of the very summary power which cl. (8) confers. Nevertheless I think that although the learned Deputy Magistrate was right in holding that the application under cl. (8) was not competent before him, still in the circumstances he would have exercised a proper discretion in giving the first party time to cross-examine the second party's witnesses.

The result, therefore, is that the application for transfer being no longer necessary is dismissed, but the case is remanded to the District Magistrate in order that it may be disposed of in the manner directed in this judgment.

Scroope, J.—I agree.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 133, 138—Various obstructions by several persons—Order, what it must contain—Jury, appointment, of—Procedure.

When in proceedings under s. 133, Criminal Procedure Code, it is alleged that various unlawful obstructions have been caused upon a public way, it is essential that the order issued under the section should state accurately with regard to each person, the specific obstruction made by him which he is required to remove, unless it is alleged that all the persons are jointly responsible for all the obstructions mentioned. [p. 220, col. 2.]

Raimohan Karmokar v. Emperor (1), followed.

Where in a proceeding under s. 133, Criminal Procedure Code, a Magistrate appointed the nominees of the two parties with a Foreman, appointed by himself, to constitute a Jury:

Held, that the Jury was not constituted legally and was incapable of making a legally binding award. [ibid.]

Upendra Nath Bhattacharjee v. Khitish Chandra Bhattacharjee (2), followed.

Case reported by the Sessions Judge, Karnal, with his No. 15 J. of 15th January, 1927.

FACTS.—Hem Raj and four others had applied to the Magistrate under s. 133, Criminal Procedure Code, for removal of certain obstructions by 16 persons of the opposite party from the Goradeh of the village Kirora in Tehsil Kaithal. An initial order was recorded in the case by the Magistrate on the 25th March, 1926, and the Jury was appointed by order, dated 29th May, 1926, and their verdict dated 24th July, 1926, was not acceptable to either party. On 22nd August, 1926, the Magistrate passed an order that the case be sent back to the Jurors for recording the evidence of the parties which they had not done before and filing a fresh award. But on the 23rd he recorded a statement of the Foreman of the Jury that all the obstructions in the shamilat land should be removed and then passed an order making his order dated 26th March absolute. As there is no order dated 26th of March probably what the Magistrate meant was his order, dated 25th March. It is against this order of the Magistrate that the present application for revision has been filed by Khem Chand and Singh Ram.

GROUND.—The initial order of the Magistrate does not specify what are the obstructions raised by each one of the accused. I am very doubtful if a single proceeding could have been taken against all the 16 persons because the obstruction raised by each was his own affair and the others had nothing to do with it. So I think that each person should have been separately proceeded against. But even if the single proceeding against all the 16 persons be held valid, the initial order of the Magistrate should have specified what was the nature and the extent of the obstruction raised by each person. In Raimohan Karmokar v. Emperor (1) it was held that an order issued under s. 133 should not be vague and indefinite but must be such that the persons to whom it is directed may be able to learn from its terms what it is that they are to do for the purpose of complying with it and that when in proceedings under s. 133 instituted against a number of persons it is alleged that various unlawful obstructions have been caused upon a public way, it is essential that the order should state accurately with regard to each person, the specific obstructions made by him which he is required to remove unless it is alleged that all the persons are jointly responsible for all the obstructions mentioned.

That the Jury was not legally constituted, firstly because there was no application by the accused, as required by ss. 133 and 138 for the appointment of Jury, secondly, the Magistrate's order of 29th of May shows that he appointed two of the nominees of the one party and two of the other and Foreman himself. Section 138 lays down that the Foreman and half of the remaining members shall be nominated by the Magistrate and Upendra Nath Bhattacharjee v. Khitish Chandra Bhattacharjee (2) shows that when the Magistrate appoints only the nominees of the two parties, with a Foreman appointed by himself, the Jury is not constituted legally and is incapable of making a legally binding award.

It is recommended, therefore, that the order of the Magistrate may be set aside.

ORDER.—Proceedings under s. 133 of the Criminal Procedure Code have been forwarded by the learned Sessions Judge of Karnal for revision to this Court on the ground that the order of the Magistrate does not specify what are the obstructions raised by each of the accused. I do not find on the record any allegation that all the persons had jointly raised these obstructions or that they had raised them in conspiracy with each other. I, therefore, consider that the order was bad in form. I also hold as pointed out by the learned Sessions Judge that the Jury was not legally constituted in that the Magistrate seems to have appointed the entire Jury himself instead of appointing the Foreman and half the Jury and leaving the other half to be nominated by the parties. I, therefore, accept the revision and set aside the order of the learned Magistrate.

(1) 35 Ind. Cas. 969; 20 C. W. N. 1171; 17 Cr. L. J. 408; 44 C. 61.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 342, 364.—Summary trial of warrant case—Examination of accused, whether should be recorded.

In a summary trial of a warrant case, although a Magistrate is bound to examine the accused under s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code he is not bound to record such examination as provided for in s. 364 of the Code.

Criminal revision from an order of the Sessions Judge, Shahabad, dated the 4th October, 1926, affirming that of the Magistrate, First Class, Sasaram, dated the 15th September, 1926.

Mr. S. Sinha (with him Mr. D. L. Nandkeolyar), for the Petitioners.

JUDGMENT.

Kulwant Sahay, J.—The petitioners were convicted of an offence punishable under s. 121 of the Indian Railways Act. The petitioner No. 1 was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 60 and the petitioner No. 2 to pay a fine of Rs. 30.

The only question raised in the present application for revision is that the provisions of s. 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure have not been complied with. The trial in this case was a summary trial under the provisions of Chap. XXII of the Code. Section 263 of the Code prescribes the form in which certain particulars have to be recorded and cl. (g) of s. 263 provides that the plea of the accused and his examination (if any) are to be recorded in the form prescribed. Section 364 of the Code prescribes the mode in which an accused person ought to be examined by a Magistrate or by any Court other than a High Court. Clause (4) of s. 364, however, says:

“Nothing in this section shall be deemed to apply to the examination of an accused person under s. 263 (or in the course of a trial held by a Presidency Magistrate).”

The case made is that the examination of the accused persons by the Magistrate was not in compliance with the provisions of s. 364 inasmuch as the proper questions to be put to the accused under s. 342 were not put to him. It appears from the order sheet of the Magistrate that the examination of the prosecution witnesses was finished on the 10th August, 1926, and thereafter the accused were told what the charge against them was and they pleaded not guilty to the charge. Thereafter on the 20th August, 1926, one prosecution witness was re-called and examined. Thereafter as appears from the order sheet of that date, the accused persons were examined and then a date was fixed for defence witnesses. The record in the form prescribed under s. 263 of the Code shows in the column prescribed for recording the plea of the accused and his examination, if any, the accused pleaded not guilty, and it is stated that they would file a written statement. Therefore, on a reference to the order sheet of the 20th August, 1926, and to the form prescribed under s. 263 of the Code, it is clear that the accused were examined under the provisions of s. 342. What the nature of the examination was is not stated; but in a summary trial, under the provisions of s. 364, it is not necessary for the Magistrate to take down the questions and answers in detail and there is nothing in this case to show that the examination of the accused persons in this case was not a proper examination as prescribed by s. 342 of the Code.

Reliance has been placed by learned Counsel for the petitioners upon the decision in Balkeshwar Singh v. Emperor (1) where it was held that a written statement filed by an accused person cannot take the place of his examination under s. 342 and that the procedure laid down for warrant cases applies although the trial is a summary one under s. 262 and that it is, therefore, mandatory upon the Magistrate to examine the accused under s. 342 even in a summary trial of warrant cases. The correctness of this proposition is not challenged and nobody denies that even in a summary trial the Magistrate is bound to examine the accused under s. 342. The question is whether he is bound to record the examination as provided for in s. 364 of the Code. That section itself says that it is not necessary for the Magistrate in a summary trial to record the examination in detail. Nothing has been shown in this case that the examination was not a proper examination.

This application is dismissed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 197—Government Officer acting as Polling Officer in Municipal election—Prosecution for offence under Madras District Municipalities Act (V of 1920)—Sanction of Local Government, whether necessary—Acting in the discharge of official duty, meaning of.

A Government Officer, such as a Tahsildar, who is appointed by the Chairman of a Municipal Council as a Polling Officer under the Madras District Municipalities Act does not, while he is acting as a Polling Officer, act or purport to act in the discharge of his official duty as a Tahsildar; and sanction under s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code need not, therefore, be obtained before instituting criminal proceedings against him for an offence committed by him while acting as a Polling Officer. [p. 223, col. 2.]

Petition, under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of Session, West Godavari, at Ellore, in Cr. R. P. No. 23 of 1926 presented to revise the judgment of the Court of the Joint First Class Magistrate, Narasapur, in C. O. No. 80 of 1926.

Mr. P. Venkataramana Rao, for the Petitioner.

Mr. V. Suryanarayana, for the Respondent.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This petition raises the question whether sanction under s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code should be obtained before instituting criminal proceedings against a Tahsildar who acted as a Polling Officer in connection with a Municipal election.

The facts are briefly these: Under G. O. No. 1367, L. & M. dated April 3, 1925, "...where a Chairman of a Municipal Council or the President of a Local Board desires to have the services of an officer of the Revenue Department for the conduct of a particular election, he may apply to the Collector and the Collector may spare an officer's services if he is able to do so." Acting under this Government Order, the Chairman of the Ellore Municipality obtained from the Collector the services of the petitioner, a Tahsildar, to act as a Polling Officer in the 5th Ward of the Ellore Municipality during a recent Municipal election. It is alleged that, while acting in that capacity, the petitioner committed an offence under s. 58 of the District Municipalities Act, which runs as follows: "Every person who in the course of electoral operations falsifies or attempts to falsify the record of an election by removing, destroying, altering or fabricating nomination papers or voting papers or by any other act or by any omission, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description which may extend to one year or with fine or with both." The case against the petitioner is described in paras. 6 and 7 of the complaint. Paragraph 7 runs thus: "The accused wilfully marked the votes wrongly and falsified and attempted to falsify and fabricate the records of the election and committed an offence punishable under s. 58 of the Madras District Municipalities Act and also ss. 465 and 469 of the Indian Penal Code." It is not necessary for the purpose of this case to state the facts of the complaint in greater detail.

When the case was taken up for trial, objection was taken on behalf of the petitioner that this is a case in which sanction of the Government is necessary under s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code and that, as such sanction had admittedly not been obtained, the complaint should be dismissed. Upholding the objection, the Joint Magistrate dismissed the complaint. The learned Sessions Judge on revision set aside the order of the Joint Magistrate and directed him to dispose of the case according to law. The present revision petition is against the order of the Sessions Judge.

Section 197 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code runs as follows:—"When any person who is a Judge within the meaning of s. 19 of the Indian Penal Code, or when any Magistrate, or when any public servant who is not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of a Local Government or some higher authority, is accused of any offence alleged to have been committed by him while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty, no Court shall take cognizance of such offence except with the previous sanction of the Local Government." To establish the contention that sanction should have been obtained the petitioner has to show (1) that he is a public servant who is not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of the Local Government and (2) that he is accused of an offence alleged to have been committed by him while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty. If either of these conditions does not apply to the petitioner, then clearly it is not necessary to obtain the previous sanction of the Local Government to institute proceedings against him. Following the argument of the learned Vakil for the petitioner, dealing with the second question first, we have to see whether the petitioner, while acting as a Polling Officer under the District Municipalities Act, was acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty, his official duty being that of a Tahsildar. It is alleged that, because the Collector has lent the petitioner's services to the Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that he was acting as a Polling Officer, he still remains a Tahsildar and was acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty as a Tahsildar. No direct authority in support of the argument has been brought to our notice. Under r. 8 (1) of the rules for the conduct of elections of Municipal Councillors, "If owing to there being more candidates than there are vacancies, a poll has to be taken, the Chairman shall appoint forthwith one or more Polling Officers for each polling station and may pay them reasonable remuneration for their services." It is conceded that the petitioner, when his services were lent to the Chairman, was appointed as a Polling Officer by the Chairman and that it was after this appointment that he began to discharge the duties of a Polling Officer. In certain cases it is the duty of the Municipal Chairman to appoint a Polling Officer, and the Polling Officer acquires the status of a Polling Officer by the appointment by the Municipal Chairman. The Municipal Chairman may appoint any person he likes as a Polling Officer subject to the restrictions contained in the rule. The fact that the officer so appointed happens to be a Tahsildar or that he was appointed after obtaining the permission of the Collector does not affect the decision of the question. We are of opinion that the person appointed, though he is a Tahsildar, was, for the time being, not acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty as a Tahsildar and, therefore, s. 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code can have no application. As one of the essential conditions necessary for the application of the section is not satisfied in this case, it is not necessary to consider the other condition, namely, whether the petitioner is a public servant who is not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of the Local Government.

We think the order of the Sessions Judge is right and dismiss this criminal revision petition.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 144, 145—Proceedings under s. 144, when to be taken.

A Court should not proceed under s. 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code where it will be better to draw up proceedings under s. 145 of the Code.

Criminal revision from an order of the District Magistrate, Patna, dated the 2nd August, 1927.

Messrs. H. L. Nandkeolyar and B. K. Prasad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. H. P. Sinha and Government Pleader, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application is directed against an order of the Sub-Divisional Officer of Barh directing under s. 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code that the second party should not go on to the land in dispute. The application is made by Musammât Latifan who is one of the second party. The land originally belonged to her husband who died a number of years ago leaving three daughters, one of whom was married to Mohammad Ibrahim, the first party. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate has found that the rent receipts from 1326 to 1331 show that rent was paid by Ibrahim. In the next two years the rent was paid by his son. The second party's case was that she obtained all the land in lieu of dower. Ibrahim's case is that he is in possession as a co-sharer as his wife's heir. The order under s. 144 has already expired. I would have declined to interfere for that reason, had it not been for the fact that in my opinion on the report submitted by the Police this was certainly a case in which it would have been better to draw up proceedings under s. 145. The Magistrate has found that Ibrahim lived with Musammât Latifan and, as I have said, that Ibrahim paid the rent. These facts by themselves certainly do not necessarily indicate that Ibrahim is solely in possession of the land. He may be a co-sharer or he may be cultivating on behalf of his mother-in-law. It is argued that prejudice may accrue to the second party if the order under s. 144 is allowed to stand. In my opinion the dispute between the parties is not likely to be satisfactorily settled in this way, and proceedings under s. 145 should have been drawn up in the first instance. I, therefore, set aside the order under s. 144. If it is thought desirable, proceedings should be taken under s. 145 without delay.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 139—Charge—No offence disclosed—High Court's power to quash charge.

A High Court is competent to quash a charge and dismiss a complaint, in exercise of its revisional powers where no offence is disclosed by the prosecution evidence.

Petition for revision of an order of the District Magistrate, Shapur District, dated the 3rd May, 1927.

Mr. M. L. Puri, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Lachhman Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioners are Tahiru and his wife Musammât Taban. Jallu claimed to be the father-in-law of the petitioner's daughter Musammât Shani and his complaint was that they (petitioners) came to him and asked him to send Musammât Shani with them for paying a visit to the goddess at Kangra, that he sent Shani with them but they did not return her to him. He further stated that Musammât Shani took away with her her ornaments of the value of Rs. 700 and that the petitioners made a false representation to him in order to take away the girl with her ornaments. It is contended on behalf of the petitioners that the complaint discloses no offence and that the charge framed against them under s. 417, Indian Penal Code, should, therefore, be quashed.

Now assuming that the statement of facts made in the complaint is true (though the petitioners plead that it is entirely false) it does not conclusively follow therefrom that the petitioners made a false representation to the complainant, even if, as a matter of fact, they did not take the girl to Kangra for paying a visit to the temple of the goddess there. There is nothing in the evidence produced by the complainant to show that the petitioners had no intention of visiting Kangra when they represented to the complainant that they wanted to go there. It may be that they changed their mind subsequently and did not go. Thus no case under s. 417, Indian Penal Code, appears to have been made out. I, therefore, quash the charge and dismiss the complaint.

Custom—Succession—Chopra Khatri of Jullundur District—Collaterals, whether exclude daughters.

There is no special custom among the Chopra Khatri of the Jullundur District by which daughters are excluded from inheriting the property of their father by collaterals where the father was separate from the collaterals. [p. 225, col. 2.]

First appeal from a decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Jullundur, dated the 16th May, 1922.

Lala Badri Das, R. B., and Mr. Dev Raj Sawhney, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Fakir Chand and Wasdev, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The pedigree table of the parties is printed at page 74 of the paper-book. The plaintiffs are the daughters of Megh Raj, deceased, and they sued his brother Ganesh Das, and the widow of one Nandu, son of another brother of Megh Raj, namely, Chint Ram, and Umra, grandson of Chint Ram, for possession of their father's property. They also claimed Rs. 400 from Ganesh Das alleging that the said sum had been deposited with Ganesh Das by their mother Musammat Ralli. Ganesh Das died during the pendency of the suit, and his sons were brought on the record as his legal representatives. Various pleas were raised by the defendants, but the trial Court decreed the plaintiffs' suit except as to a half share in the property shown as No. (d) in the plaint, namely, a shop situate in Lal Bazar, Jullundur City, and as to the Rs. 400 alleged to have been deposited with Ganesh Das. Both sides have appealed.

So far as the appeal of Umra and others is concerned the sole point urged before us has been that by the custom of the Chopra Khatri of Jullundur District daughters are excluded from inheriting the property of their father by collaterals, even though the father was separate from the collaterals. The parties are high caste Hindus, and the onus admittedly lies heavily on the appellants to prove the special custom alleged. The evidence given in the case is oral. Various instances are given by the witnesses in which daughters were excluded by the collaterals. It is also urged that a custom of this kind can be proved by the statements of persons of the brotherhood, who are in a position to know the facts and who have deposed to the existence of this custom. It is also contended that there is no rebuttal of the evidence given on behalf of the appellants, and that not a single instance has been proved by the other side in which a daughter succeeded to the exclusion of the collaterals. We have been through the instances adduced in support of the custom and we are satisfied that they are not sufficient to prove the alleged custom. In many of the cases it is not clear that the deceased father was separate from the collaterals who excluded the daughters. In others it seems that the daughters had no issue and were maintained by the collaterals. In such cases it is quite possible that the daughter was unwilling to assert her right to a life-interest in her father's property, and it does not follow that she could not have inherited the property of her separated father if she had chosen to assert that right instead of contenting herself with being maintained. We have been pressed by the argument that the respondents have been unable to produce a single instance of a daughter succeeding in the presence of collaterals. It must, however, be borne in mind that these Chopra families in the Jullundur District are not very numerous, and it is possible that no case has arisen in which a separated Chopra Khatri died leaving no sons, and leaving daughters who were in a position to assert their right of succession. We are, therefore, of opinion that the defendants-appellants have failed to establish the special custom which they pleaded and the appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

As regards the cross-appeal of the plaintiffs the important document mentioned in the judgment (Ex. P-19) has not been printed and by the rules of this Court cannot, therefore, be referred to. There is no excuse for the non-printing of this document which is distinctly referred to in the judgment. The cross-appeal, therefore, as to the half share of the shop which is disallowed must also fail as the plaintiffs-appellants cannot establish that Kishen Chand was a tenant of the shop. The only other point urged by Counsel for the appellants was that the costs should have been given in proportion to the success of the parties. It seems to us, however, that the defendants-appellants had some ground for raising the plea of custom and the plaintiffs failed as to that part of the case on which they produced evidence. The only question, therefore, could be of Pleader's fee. In the circumstances we are not prepared to interfere with the discretion of the trial Court in the matter, and we, therefore, dismiss the cross-appeal with costs also.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 28—Income Tax Act (XI of 1922), s. 3—Partnership between license-holders of toddy shops with persons not so licensed, legality of—Liability of all persons to assessment to income-tax.

Where four persons bid and obtained some toddy shops on lease and the profits from the said shops were shared between seven persons, and all the seven assisted in the working and financing of the shop:

Held, that the partnership was not illegal and did not offend the Abkari Rules, inasmuch as there was no case of the license-holders either selling, transferring or sub-renting the shops which they had taken on lease; and that it was, therefore, competent in such a case to the Income-tax Commissioner to assess under s. 3 of the Income Tax Act all the members of the partnership on the combined profits of the four shops.

Case stated by the Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, in his reference to the High Court, dated the 21st October, 1925, under s. 65 (2) of the Income Tax Act for a decision on the following question:

"Whether a body of individuals who have agreed to take in auction, work and share the profits from four toddy shops can be taxed under s. 3 of the Indian Income Tax Act on the combined profits of the four shops."

Mr. M. Patanjali Sastri, for the Referring Officer.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Assessee.

JUDGMENT.—The question referred is, "Whether a body of individuals who have agreed to take in auction, work and share the profits from four toddy shops can be taxed under s. 3 of the Income Tax Act on the combined profits of the four shops."

The Income-tax Commissioner finds that there was a body of seven persons who formed a sort of partnership. Of these seven persons, four bid and obtained leases of four toddy shops and the profits from those four toddy shops were shared between the seven persons; apparently also all the seven assisted in the working and financing of those shops. On this finding he holds that this association of persons was not an illegal association under the Abkari Rules. Here the petitioner's Vakil questions that finding and contends that his client and others have offended against the law in that they have contravened the provisions of r. 27 of the General Conditions of those licenses, viz., "No privilege of supply or vend shall be sold, transferred or sub-rented without Collector's previous permission." There is no evidence that the license-holders have either sold, transferred or sub-rented the shops which they have taken on lease. It is not, therefore, apparent how that rule has been contravened and, certainly, we cannot presume illegality, in the absence of any evidence of such illegality.

The answer, therefore, to the question must be in the affirmative. Costs, including Counsel's fee Rs. 250 to be paid by the petitioner.

Before a person who has consigned his goods under Risk Note B is entitled to maintain an action for damages for loss of his goods, he must definitely prove that the loss was caused by reason of the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or its servants. If and when he has succeeded in proving such neglect it will be open to the Railway Administration to claim immunity by proving that the theft was from a running train. Petition for revision of a decree of the Senior Sub-Judge, Ferozepore, dated the 28th July, 1926, affirming that of the Sub-Judge, Fourth Class, Ferozepore, dated the 14th May, 1926.

Mr. C. H. Carden Noad, Government Advocate, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Muhammad Amin, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—On the 14th July, 1922, the Gwalior Metal Works Company Ltd. booked a consignment of 21 bags of aluminium wares at the Gwalior Railway Station on the G. I. P. Railway for carriage to Ferozepore City on the North Western Railway. The goods were booked to the consignor himself but he had endorsed the Railway receipt in favour of the plaintiff thus entitling him to take delivery of the consignment at Ferozepore. When the plaintiff went to the Ferozepore Railway Station to take delivery, it was discovered that only 3 bags out of 21 had arrived and that the remaining 18 bags were not forthcoming. The plaintiff took delivery of the 3 bags and on the 27th of August, 1923, instituted the present suit against the Secretary of State for India through the Agent, North Western Railway, for recovery of Rs. 495-3-6 being the price of the missing 18 bags. In the plaint it was alleged that the loss was due to the wilful neglect and gross carelessness of the Railway Administration. The G. I. P. Railway and the Gwalior Metal Works were also impleaded as defendants but none of them appeared and the proceedings were ex parte against them.

The Secretary of State pleaded, inter alia, that the goods were booked at a special reduced rate at the owner's risk under Risk Note B and that for this reason the Railway Administration was free from all liability for the alleged loss. It was further pleaded that the goods had been lost on the G. I. P. Railway in a theft committed from a running train and that for this reason also the defendant No. 1 was not liable. The plaintiff at first denied the execution of the Risk Note B but later on he admitted it.

The trial Court found that the contention of the defendant that the goods had been lost on the G. I. P. Railway was not proved and also that the defendant had failed to establish that the goods were lost in a theft committed from a running train.

On these findings but without going into the question as to whether the defendant No. 1 was guilty of wilful neglect, it decreed the plaintiff's suit.

On appeal by the defendant No. 1 to the Senior Sub-Judge at Ferozepore, it was specifically urged in the memorandum of appeal that the lower Court could not legally pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff in view of the fact that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the Railway Administration. The other findings as to the loss having occurred on the N.W. Railway and the goods not having been stolen from a running train were also challenged. The Appellate Court, however, upheld these findings, but without going into the question of wilful neglect on the part of the defendant No. 1 dismissed the appeal.

The defendant No. 1 has come up to this Court on the revision side and the learned Government Advocate, who appears in support of the petition for revision has, accepting the findings of the Courts below as correct, argued that the Courts have acted with material irregularity in not applying their minds to the really vital point in the case, namely, whether a decree for damages for loss of the goods consigned, under Risk Note B could be passed in favour of a consignee against the Railway Administration without a definite finding that the Railway Administration was guilty of wilful neglect.

After hearing the learned Government Advocate for the petitioner and Mr. Muhammad Amin, who appears for the respondent, I am of opinion that this contention must prevail.

In Risk Note B it is definitely provided that the Railway Administration will carry the goods "harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss, destruction or deterioration of, or damage to, the said consignment, from any cause whatever except for the loss of a complete consignment or of a one or more complete packages forming part of a consignment due either to the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants,.....provided the term wilful neglect be not held to include fire, robbery from a running train or any other unforeseen event or accident." It is, therefore, clear that before a person, who has consigned his goods under Risk Note B is entitled to maintain an action for damages for loss of his goods, he must definitely prove that the loss was caused by reason of the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration or its servants. If and when he has succeeded in proving such neglect, it will be open to the Railway Administration to claim immunity by proving that the theft was from a running train. It is now well-settled that the onus of proving that the Railway was guilty of wilful neglect lies clearly upon the plaintiff. There was at one time a conflict of judicial authority on this point but all doubts have been set at rest by the decision of the House of Lords in the well-known case of Smith Ltd. v. Great Western Ry. Co. (1), where it was held with reference to a Risk Note, the terms of which were very similar to those of Risk Note B, that it lies upon the plaintiff to affirmatively establish that the loss was due to the wilful misconduct of the Railway Company and its servants, and that the failure of the Railway to account for the loss of the goods was not evidence, which justified the Court in inferring that the loss arose from such wilful misconduct.

The learned Counsel for the respondents, however, has argued that in this case the Railway had set up a plea of loss by theft from a running train and having failed to prove it, it is not open to it now to insist upon the plaintiff proving wilful neglect on the part of the defendants. In my opinion this contention is devoid of all force. In a case, which is very similar to the present one a Division Bench of the Patna High Court held that where the Railway Company alleged theft from a running train but failed to prove the allegation, the admission was not of theft at large but of a specific form of theft; and that in any case the onus still lay on the plaintiff to prove neglect or theft by the servants of the Company: Great Indian Peninsula Ry. v. Datti Ram (2). In a somewhat similar case, the Bombay High Court also came to the same decision in B. B. & C. I. Ry. Co. v. Ranchhodlal Chotalal & Co. (3). The terms of the Risk Note are very clear and cast a duty on the consignor to establish that the Railway was guilty of wilful neglect before he can hold it liable for the loss.

In the present case the plaintiff specifically alleged in his plaint wilful neglect on the part of the defendant, but led no evidence whatever in support of it. Nor are there any materials on the record from which I can infer that the defendant or any of its servants was guilty of any such neglect. Respondent's Counsel concedes that this is so, but urges that this is a petition for revision under s. 44 of the Punjab Courts Act and even if a mistake of law has been committed by the Appellate Court this Court ought not to interfere. But this is not a case in which the lower Appellate Court has come to an erroneous decision on a point of law. Here as already pointed out the Appellate Court (as also the trial Judge), has failed to take notice of the real point in the case and has given no decision on it at all. This is clearly a material irregularity justifying interference on the revision side. See Tej Bhan v. Wali Dad (4), Bawa Naraingir v. Miran Baksh (5), Baij Nath Mistry v. Jang Bahadur (6) and Sibu Sant v. Netai Charan Das (7).

For the foregoing reason, I accept the petition and setting aside the decrees of the Courts below, dismiss the plaintiff's suit. As the defendant No. 1 put forward a plea of theft from a running train but Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 7—Suit by servant for wages—Entry in master's accounts, effect of—Limitation—Plea of limitation by defendant—Evidence let in trial saving limitation, effect of, on plea.

A suit for wages as a domestic servant must be brought within one year after the same became due under Art. 7, Limitation Act. But it is open to a master, instead of paying the salary then and there to give credit in his account books and treat the servant as his creditor, and if the master does that the Law of Limitation applicable is not that under Art. 7 but the ordinary rule of limitation as to debts.

When a defendant pleads limitation and in the course of the trial something transpires which shows that the plea of limitation is not sustainable, he cannot turn round and say that he has been prejudiced by the evidence which saves limitation.

Second appeal against a decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Sivaganga, in A. S. No. 8 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Sivaganga, in O. S. No. 342 of 1920.

Mr. T. D. Srinivasagopalachariar, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. Patanjali Sastri, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The point argued in this second appeal is that the plaintiff's suit is barred by limitation under Art. 7 of the Limitation Act, inasmuch as it is a claim for salary as a domestic servant. The contention of Mr. Srinivasagopalachariar for the appellant is that the plaint as laid is only for salary as a domestic servant and the suit having been brought more than one year after the wages became due the suit is barred by limitation. No doubt the plaint recites the circumstances under which the plaintiff entered into the service of the defendant and it also mentions when and where he worked. The defendant pleaded limitation and in the course of the evidence it transpired that there were entries in plaintiff's favour in the defendant's account books in his branches at Sokkatrang and Annoy. Both the lower Courts have relied upon these entries as saving the bar of limitation. The suit for wages as a domestic servant no doubt must be brought within one year after the same became due. But it is open to a master, instead of paying the salary then and there to give credit in his account books and treat the servant as his creditor. It would make no difference whether the master gives a pro-note for wages or whether he gives credit in his account books and treats him as his creditor. If the master does that then the Law of Limitation applicable is not that under Art. 7 but the ordinary rule of limitation as to debts. In this case the amount due to the plaintiff was entered in the account books of the defendant's branches at two different places. What is contended by Mr. Srinivasagopalachariar before me is that the plaintiff did not make any reference to it and that his client's case should not be prejudiced by any evidence turning up in the course of the trial in the case. He is not able to show that he was in any way prejudiced by the evidence which came out during the trial. When a defendant pleads limitation and in the course of the trial something transpires which shows that the plea of limitation is not sustainable he cannot turn round and say that he has been prejudiced by the evidence which saves limitation. The plaintiff would have been well advised in averring in his plaint the fact that the amount of salary which was due to him was credited in the books of the defendant. Though the plaintiff is bound by the averments in the plaint yet in the case of a mofussil plaints we cannot apply the strict rule that the parties should not vary their pleadings during the course of the trial. No doubt if the character of the suit is likely to be materially changed as to prejudice the other party such a change should not be permitted. But I do not think the defendant has in any way been prejudiced by the District Munsif and the Subordinate Judge acting upon the evidence which came out during the trial that the plaintiff's salary was credited in the defendant's firm and thereby the plaintiff became a creditor of the defendant. The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

APPEAL AGAINST APPELLATE ORDER NO. 132
OF 1925.

September 1, 1927.

Present:—Sir William Watkins Phillips,
Kt., Officiating Chief Justice,
Mr. Justice Beasley and Mr. Justice
Ananthakrishna Ayyar.

A. NARAYANAN NAMBU DIRI—KARNAVAN AND MANAGER OF ETTASERI MUNNOT MANGALATH
ILLAM—APPELLANT

versus

PUTHISSERI THEVA AMMA

AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Malabar Law—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47, O. XXI, r. 58—Decree against karnavan in representative capacity—Members of tarwad, whether parties to suit—Objection by member to attachment, whether falls within s. 47 or O. XXI, r. 58, Civil Procedure Code—Appeal.

Where a decree is passed against the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad in his representative capacity, the junior members of the tarwad cannot be held to be parties to the decree within the meaning of s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code, and a claim by a junior member to property attached in execution of that decree falls within the purview of O. XXI, r. 58 of the Civil Procedure Code and not within s. 47 of the Code. [p. 238, col. 1; p. 239, col. 2.]

Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Morakayar (2), followed.

Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) and Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7), overruled.

Per Phillips, Offg. C. J.—Where a person is an actual party to the suit, his rights in any other capacity must be deemed to be rights of a party to the suit and he must, consequently, come under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code; but when he is not an actual party, but is merely a constructive party represented by another, he can only be deemed to be a party or representative of a party in the capacity in respect of which he was so represented. In any other capacity, more especially when such capacity is adverse to the person who represented him, he can in no sense be deemed to be a party to a decree or representative of a party. [p. 238, col. 1.]

Per Ananthakrishna Ayyar, J.—The circumstance that a decree obtained against the tarwad karnavan as such is binding on all the members of the tarwad does not make the other members parties to the suit. [p. 238, col. 2.]

Prima facie only those are parties to the suit within the meaning of s. 47, Civil Procedure Code, whose names appear in the decree. [ibid.]

Where such members of a tarwad are not eo nomine parties to the decree, and where only the karnavan of the whole tarwad is sued as such, the claims that might be put forward in the course of execution of such decree by the joint co-owner members or the tavazhi members should not be dealt with as put forward by persons who are parties to the suit. [p. 239, col. 1.]

A decree for money obtained against the karnavan alone as such could not be executed against the junior members. Such a decree could be executed against the tarwad properties, but not against the junior members. [p. 239, col. 2.]

Appeal against an order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Tellicherry, dated the 17th July, 1925, in A.S. No. 174 of 1925 (A. S. No. 28 of 1924, District Court) preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Quilandi, dated the 10th November, 1923, in R.M.P. No. 1667 of 1923, in O.S. No. 345 of 1912.

This appeal came on for hearing on the 30th March, 1927, and having been set down to be spoken to on the 1st and 11th of April, 1927, and having stood over for consideration till the 29th April, 1927, the Court (Devadoss and Madhavan Nair, JJ.), delivered the following

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

Devadoss, J.—The only point for consideration in this appeal is whether an appeal lay to the lower Appellate Court from the order of the District Munsif on a petition filed under O. XXI, r. 58, and s. 47, Civil Procedure Code. A decree was obtained in O. S. No. 345 of 1912 by one Narayanan Nambudri against Krishnan Nair and his brother Ramunni Nair for Rs. 344. Krishnan Nair was made liable as karnavan of the tarwad in addition to his personal liability. In execution of that decree certain moveables belonging to the tarwad were attached. The junior members objected to the attachment on the ground that the tarwad was not bound by the decree. They failed in their petition and 22 junior members brought O.S. No. 38 of 1920 to set aside the decree so far as the tarwad was concerned and they succeeded in the suit with the result that Krishnan Nair and Ramunni Nair were made personally liable for the decree amount. The decree-holder attached some of the properties of the tavazhi and the sister of Krishnan Nair and Ramunni Nair objected to the attachment on the ground that the properties belonged to the Putravakasam tavazhi and that the judgment-debtors had no exclusive interest over it. This petition was presented under O. XXI, r. 58, and s. 47, Civil Procedure Code. The District Munsif dismissed that petition; on appeal to the lower Appellate Court it was contended that no appeal lay as the members of the tavazhi were not parties to the suit. But the Subordinate Judge overruled that objection and on the merits allowed the appeal. Narayanan Nambudri, the decree-holder, has filed this civil miscellaneous appeal. The contention of Mr. Krishna Menon for the appellant is that the appeal to the lower Appellate Court was incompetent as the petitioners who objected to the attachment were not parties to the decree or their legal representatives.

To O. S. No. 345 of 1912 Krishnan Nair and Ramunni Nair were parties as well as the tarwad of which Krishnan Nair was the karnavan. The objection now put forward is that the property under attachment does not belong to the tarwad, but is the property of the tavazhi which was not represented in the suit. The Subordinate Judge, in para. 3 of his judgment, says: "No doubt the property is now claimed as belonging to a tavazhi within the common tarwad, but on the same principle the tavazhi must also be considered to have been a constructive party." The argument of the Subordinate Judge amounts to this: that if a tarwad is sued by making the karnavan party or all the members of the tarwad parties, the tavazhis of which the tarwad is composed must necessarily be considered to be parties to the suit. This view is against the theory that a tavazhi is a distinct entity so far as the holding of property is concerned from the tarwad and though according to the peculiar system of Malabar Law members of a tavazhi may form a tarwad, yet each tavazhi is entitled to own property separately and a tarwad cannot utilize the properties of the tavazhi for its purposes. In other words the tarwad and the tavazhi are two distinct entities or bodies for the purpose of owning property. The tavazhi property cannot benefit the members of the tarwad as a whole though the tavazhi members are entitled to get a share of the income of the tarwad property. This distinction unfortunately has not been given effect to in some of the decisions quoted at the bar. Even though all the members of a tarwad are made parties to a suit eo nomine, yet if the suit is only against a tarwad it would not be right to say that the tavazhi also was represented in the suit merely because the members of the tavazhi were made parties in their capacity as members of the tarwad. If a person occupies two distinct positions or fills two different offices his being sued in his capacity as representing one body, cannot be held as his being sued in another capacity representing another body which was not sued. Suppose A and B are the trustees of a certain trust; suppose they also happen to be the trustees of another trust. If a suit is brought against them in respect of one trust would it be right to say that they being the trustees of the second trust it must be held that the second trust was a party to the suit in order to attract the provisions of s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure. When the karnavan of a tarwad is sued as karnavan I think it would not only be doing violence to language, but it would be against all principles of construction of pleadings to hold that he is also sued as representing the tavazhi. Where he is sued as representing the tarwad and the tavazhi it may be said that he must be taken to represent both in the suit. But where the suit is confined to some relief against the tarwad only I think it would be opposed to all principles of justice to hold that he must be taken to have represented the tavazhi. It is not the name of the person that is of importance, but the substance and the nature of the suit. With these observations I proceed to consider the cases relied on by both the parties.

Mr. Krishna Menon relies upon a recent decision of this Court reported as Peetika-yila Kath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1). The facts in that case were, A obtained a decree against the Anandravan of a Malabar tarwad and in execution thereof attached certain immoveable properties in possession of the judgment-debtor. He died; but on his death the karnavan of the tarwad was brought on the record as his legal representative. He set up the claim of the tarwad to the property, and contended that the judgment-debtor had no partible interest in the property and it was not attachable. The District Munsif dismissed the petition and on appeal by the karnavan the Appellate Court set aside the attachment. Against that order a revision petition was filed in the High Court. The question was raised whether an appeal lay to the lower Appellate Court. Justice Abdur Rahim and Justice Spencer held that no appeal lay to the lower Appellate Court and that the point was covered by the Full Bench case in Ramanathan Chet- tiar v. Levvai Morakayar (2) and a decision of the Calcutta High Court in Kartick Chandra Ghose v. Ashutosh Dhara (3). They observe at page 394* "The claim he put forward in respect of the property was that it belonged not to the judgment-debtor, but to the tarwad. There seems to us no distinction in principle between this case and the cases in which the person who was a party to the suit or was brought on record as a representative of the judgment-debtor claimed the property as the trustee for certain other persons or as shebait of a temple." This decision in Peetikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1) was followed by Sadasiva Ayyar and Phillips, JJ., in Second Appeal No. 1 of 1916. The opening lines of that judgment make the point clear:—

"The plaintiffs' Thiyya Makkathayam tarwad, was not impleaded as the legal representative of the judgment-debtor Ramutty in the proceedings in execution in the former suit. Five of the present plaintiffs were impleaded as such legal representatives in their individual capacity as sons and, therefore, heirs of Ramutty to his self-acquired and separate properties. The plaintiffs, therefore, as representing the tarwad were not bound to make an application under s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure for re-delivery of the property which belonged to the tarwad and which the decree-holder-purchaser wrongfully took possession of in execution, though it was neither attached nor sold in execution. They (plaintiffs) as representing the tarwad (a third party) were entitled to bring a separate suit to recover possession of the property so wrongfully taken possession of by the decree-holder-purchaser: Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Morakayar (2).

The law has been clearly laid down by Abdur Rahim and Spencer, JJ., in Peetikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1) and though one sentence in that judgment about Kuriyali v. Mayan (4) may be inaccurate as pointed out in Naduvil Edom Kelu Achan v. Parasu Patar (5) the reasoning in that decision seems to us to be unimpeachable. Following Ramana- than Chettiar v. Levvai Morakayar (2) and Peetikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1) we hold that a separate suit can be brought by the plaintiffs' tarwad as it is not the legal representative of Ramutty." This clearly shows that where the tarwad is not brought in as the legal representative of a deceased judgment-debtor and if any of its property is attached it can apply under O. XXI, r. 58, as it is not a party either to the suit or the execution proceedings.

The facts in Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Morakayar (2) were, a decree-holder having attached certain property in the course of execution, two of the defendants in the suit in which the decree was passed presented a petition that the property may be released from the attachment on the ground that it had been set apart for charitable purposes and that it was held by the defendants as trustees. The Subordinate Judge upheld the trust and ordered the properties to be released from the attachment. The plaintiff then appealed to the High Court and a preliminary objection was taken to the appeal on the ground that no appeal lay against the order of the Subordinate Judge. The point was referred to a Full Bench and it held that the claim fell under s. 278 and not under s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that no appeal lay against an order passed by the Court executing the decree. It was further held that the claims of third parties whether put forward by themselves or by a party to the suit must be dealt with under ss. 278 to 283 and not under s. 244. Mr. Justice O'Farrell, who delivered the leading judgment in that case, observed at page 200*: "I think, however, that there can be no doubt that the balance of authority is in favour of the view that the claims of third parties, whether put forward by themselves or by a party to the suit, must be dealt with under ss. 278 to 283 and not under s. 244." He further observes: "a Court should look to the substance of the objection, and not to the accident that it is put forward by A rather than by B. If it is, in substance, an objection that falls under s. 278, it should be dealt with under that section," and he observes that this view is in accordance with a number of cases cited by him. This decision is right in principle if I may say so. If A is sued in his individual capacity, property of which he is only a trustee cannot be attached and brought to sale in execution of a personal decree against him and if such property is attached the proper course is for him to apply under O. XXI, r. 58 of the present Code corresponding to s. 278 of the old Code. The mere fact that a person is a party to a suit in his personal capacity does not make the trust of which he is a trustee a party to the suit. The question is complicated by the peculiar system obtaining in Malabar under which the tavazhis which compose a tarwad are distinct legal entities from the tarwad itself so far as the ownership of property is concerned. All the members of the tarwad are entitled to be maintained out of the income of the property of the tarwad. Even though some of the members may be members of a tavazhi which is rich yet they as members of the tarwad are entitled to receive maintenance from the tarwad so that the tarwad and the tavazhi cannot be said to be one and the same judicial person and when a tarwad is sued as such either by making the karnavan or all the members of the tarwad parties, the suit is not one against any or all the tavazhis composing the tarwad.

Mr. Ramakrishna Ayyar for the respondent very strongly relies upon Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) as supporting his contention that an appeal in this case lay to the lower Appellate Court. The facts in that case were, a decree was obtained against the karnavan of a tarwad. In execution of that decree certain properties were attached and some of the members of the tarwad put in a petition for release of the properties attached on the ground that the properties belonged not to the common tarwad but to their own tavazhi. The petition was rejected. On appeal the Subordinate Judge of South Malabar held that no appeal lay to his Court. The expression District Court in the report is obviously a mistake for Sub-Court. A civil miscellaneous appeal was presented to the High Court against the order of the Sub-Court. A Bench of this Court consisting of Justice Benson and Justice Wallis, held that an appeal lay. Benson, J., observed: "Not only defendants Nos. 2 and 6 but also all the members of their tavazhi must be held to be bound by the decree against the tarwad and parties to the suit on the principle laid down in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7)." Wallis, J., observed: "In this case a decree has been given against the karnavan as representing the members of the whole tarwad. In accordance with the decision in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) all the members of the tarwad must be taken to be parties to the suit for the purpose of execution proceedings, and, if parties, they must proceed under s. 244 and not under s. 278. The fact that they claimed the property, which has been attached, adversely to the other members of the tarwad does not make them any less constructive parties to the decree." He refers to Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Morakayar (2) and says "a defendant who objected to the attachment of property of which he was trustee was allowed to proceed under s. 278, because he was claiming as trustee on behalf of persons who were not parties to the suit, and similarly in Abdurrahiman Kutti Haji v. Kunhammad Koya (8)." With very great respect to the learned Judges I must observe that they did not keep before them the distinction between a tarwad and a tavazhi. The mere fact that the tarwad members are members of the tavazhi would not make the tavazhi a party to a suit in which the tarwad alone is concerned. Though this decision may be distinguished from the present on the facts I think the better course would be to canvass the correctness of this decision for the learned Judges have expressed themselves in such a wide language that it would not be right to go behind the plain meaning of their language by making reference to the facts of the case. If the principle of this decision is that when a tarwad is sued in the name of the karnavan, the karnavan being the representative of all the anandravans, all the tavazhis which compose the tarwad must be considered to be parties to the litigation, I am unable to accept any such proposition as correct. When there are two separate bodies which can hold properties independently of one another and whose interests may clash with one another, it cannot be said that one represents the other simply by reason that for some purposes the members composing the one happen to be members composing the other. If this decision had been consistently followed in a number of cases one should hesitate before questioning its correctness. Though the matter has been fully argued and though we gave every opportunity to both the parties to refer to the cases in which this decision has been followed we have not been referred to any case in which the principle of this decision was given effect to. In Rangan Pattar v. Lakshmi Neithiar (9) it was held that "an objection by a defendant that immoveable property attached in execution of a decree is not the private property of the judgment-debtor but that of the tavazhi consisting of the defendant, the judgment-debtor and others is one falling within s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure and an appeal will lie from the order of the Court of first instance." The facts were, a decree was obtained against defendants Nos. 1 to 3. In execution of the decree, the properties in dispute were attached. The 6th defendant objected to the attachment on the ground that the properties were not private properties of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 but belonged to a tavazhi consisting of defendants Nos. 1 to 9. The District Munsif rejected the claim. On appeal, the Subordinate Judge held that it was the property of the tavazhi and directed the raising of the attachment. From the facts it is clear that the properties were gifted to the 2nd and 3rd defendants and the question was whether the gift was exclusively for the 2nd and 3rd defendants or for the tavazhi which they represented. Arnold White, Chief Justice, and Justice Bashyam Ayyangar held that this point was covered by the Full Bench ruling in Ramaswami Sastrulu v. Kameswarama (10). In this case, the question was whether it was the property of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 or the property which belonged to them as well as to the other members of the tavazhi, and it is distinguishable from the cases in Ramanathan Chettier v. Levvai Morakayar (2) and Peetikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1). Where a person is sued and property belonging to him and some others is attached, a claim has to be made only under s. 47, for the property which is attached belongs to him though it belongs to others as well. But when he is sued in one capacity he cannot be said to be sued in all the capacities in which he could be sued. In other words when one institution is sued, it cannot be said that another institution of which the defendant happened to be the manager or trustee is also sued.

Naduvil Edom Kelu Achan v. Parasu Patar (5) is relied upon by Mr. Ramakrishna Ayyar. In that case a decree was obtained against an Anandravan of a Malabar tarwad. Certain properties alleged to belong to him were attached after his death, and the karnavan of the tarwad was brought on the record as the legal representative of the deceased Anandravan. He contended that the attached properties had been appropriated towards a debt due from the Anandravan. The Subordinate Judge held that the karnavan was not the legal representative of the Anandravan and under the above circumstances rejected the tarwad's petition. On appeal, the District Judge held that no appeal lay to him as the matter arose in claim proceedings. The High Court held that an appeal lay. Ayling and Seshagiri Ayyar, JJ., after referring to a number of cases observed: "Thus there has been a course of decisions in this Presidency which has recognized the correctness of the principle that where a person's claim is traceable to the same capacity in which he is brought in as the legal representative, the executing Court should hear and determine the matter." This observation is not against the principle of the decision in Ramanathan Chettier v. Levvai Morakayar (2). The real question is in what capacity was the defendant impleaded in the suit. If he was impleaded in the suit in one capacity he cannot be held to have been impleaded in another capacity so as to prevent him from putting forward the claim of the body which was not made a party to the suit. The decision in Meyyappa Chetty v. Chidambaram Chetty (11) has nothing to do with the present question. In O.M.A. No. 143 of 1920 this point is not discussed. Ayling and Venkatasubba Rao, JJ., observed: "It is specifically stated by the District Munsif in his order on the claim petition that the case fell under s. 47, Civil Procedure Code, and we must take it that his order was passed under that section. This being so, an appeal lies [vide Latchmanan Chetty v. Ramanathan Chetty (12)], no matter whether the petition should properly have been treated as one under O. XXI, r. 58, or not."

In Second Appeal No. 647 of 1921 the karnavan of a tarwad was made a defendant to a suit. The decree was finally passed exonerating the tavazhi properties altogether and the decree was only against the assets of one Raman Nair in the hands of the 3rd defendant as his legal representative. The learned Judge observed that "as the karnavan of the tavazhi was joined in the suit by the 1st defendant in his capacity as karnavan, I must hold that the other members of the tavazhi are constructively parties to that suit, and the plaintiff must also be treated as if he was a party and his remedy in putting forward the claim of the tavazhi is by way of an application under s. 47 and not by a suit." This case does not touch the present point. Where a person is a party to a suit even though he may be exonerated still for the purposes of s. 47 he is a party. This is clear from the Full Bench ruling in Vaddadi Sannamma v. Koduganti Radhabhai (13) and from the explanation to s. 47.

The decision in Chowdhry Wahid Ali v. Jumae (14) is discussed in Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Marakayar (2) and it is unnecessary to discuss it here. The case of Arunachellam Chetty v. Maung San Ngwe (15) does not help the respondent. There it was held that where a person is brought on the record as a legal representative of the deceased judgment debtor, the question whether the property attached is part of the assets or his own property, is one arising under s. 47, Civil Procedure Code. In cases of persons who are brought in as legal representatives they represent the deceased person and any question as to what or what is not the property of the deceased is a question which naturally arises under s. 47. If improperly the legal representatives' separate property or private property is attached he has to show that it is not part of the assets of the deceased. But that is different from saying that where a person is brought in as the legal representative in possession of the assets of the deceased person he cannot set up the right of a trust which had nothing to do with the deceased person. The question is not one of form but one of substance.

Section 47 is clear. All questions arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed or their representatives and relating to the execution, etc., shall be determined by the Court executing the decree. It must be first a question arising between the parties to the suit or legal representatives and must relate to execution, etc. But where property which is attached or which is sought to be proceeded against is not the property of a party to the suit I fail to see how an application in respect of it could come under s. 47. It can only come in under O. XXI, r. 58. The decisions in Vengapayyan v. Karimpanakal Parvati (16) and Sivarama Sastrial v. Somasundara Mudali (17) do not touch the present question. On the facts in Sivarama Sastrial v. Somasundara Mudali (17) it was held that s. 244, Civil Procedure Code applied, for the person putting forward the claim put it forward on the ground that he stood in the shoes of the person who was the party to the suit in which the decree was passed.

As the decision in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) is opposed to the Full Bench ruling in Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Marakayar (2) we should follow the Full Bench ruling in preference to the ruling of a Bench but as the matter is one of considerable importance and as it is likely to arise very often I would refer the following question to the Full Bench:—Is the decision in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) correct?

Madhavan Nair, J.—The Full Bench is requested to examine the correctness of the decision in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6). I do not object to this reference. But speaking for myself, I am quite content to stand by the decision in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6). The question is essentially one of procedure and if the procedure has been well-understood and has been followed for a long number of years, I think it is not desirable to set about altering it even if it is not deemed to be correct according to the strict letter of the law. Neither party has been able to refer to cases which have reached this Court wherein this Court has expressly followed, Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) or refused to follow it. The paucity of the decisions would rather suggest that the procedure is well-understood; but, however, that may be, I am not satisfied that Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) requires re-consideration.

The two decisions that are relied on as departing from the principle embodied in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) are (i) Peetikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1) and (ii) Second Appeal No. 1 of 1916. The facts in Peetikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1) are stated in my learned brother's judgment. It would appear that Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) is referred to neither in the arguments of the Counsel who appeared in the case nor in the judgment. In that case, on the death of an Anandran against whom a decree was obtained, the karnavan of the tarwad was brought on the record as his legal representative in the course of execution, and he put forward title to the property on behalf of the tarwad. The judgment is based on the ground that as the Anandran cannot be said to represent the tarwad, the tarwad was not constructively a party to the suit; and as the karnavan was putting forward a claim on behalf of those who were not parties to the suit it was held that the claim put forward by him could not be investigated under s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This decision in no way departs from the principle laid down in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6). Second Appeal No. 1 of 1916 followed the decision in Peetikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1). The Full Bench decision in Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Mora Kayar (2) is referred to and distinguished in the judgment in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6). The other decisions referred to, as pointed out by my learned brother, do not bear directly on the question. That a karnavan of a Malabar tarwad sued as such, represents constructively all the members of the tarwad and a decree so obtained against him is binding on the tarwad was laid down as early as Vasudevan v. Sankaran (18) and this principle was made applicable to execution proceedings in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) and Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram

Kannot Cherukot (6). Without calling into question the correctness of the Full Bench decision in Vasudevan v. Sankaran (18), I do not think it is possible to re-consider Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6). As observed in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) "to allow the junior members to make a claim as strangers under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure (s. 47 of the present Code) seems to be inconsistent with their being bound by the decree and with the policy of s. 244 and of the decision in Vasudevan v. Sankaran (18)."

I do not think that the fact that the tarwad and tavazhi are two distinct entities capable of owning separate property has been ignored in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) or in any of the decisions applying the principle embodied in it. For the sake of convenience, the karnavan is recognized as representing the entire tarwad in a suit when he is made a party to it as karnavan. The fact that the members of the tarwad fall into various tavazhis does not in any way affect the representative character of the karnavan when he is sued as the karnavan representing the entire tarwad, which, of course, includes all the tavazhis. The interests of the tavazhi, which may be adverse, are not jeopardized by this procedure. So far as the decree binds the tarwad, no one can question it; but if the tavazhi properties are attached in the course of execution of that decree, the tavazhi, if it has any right, may put forward its claim to the attached properties. When this is done, the question raised will be one between parties to the suit and will relate to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree, and s. 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure will be applicable to such proceedings.

On the facts, it is possible to distinguish the present case from the decision in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) as the decision in the subsequent suit by the junior members may be said to convert the decree under execution into a decree merely against two individual members of the tarwad one of whom happened to be the karnavan. However, as I have said, though I am willing to stand by that decision, I have no objection to the question decided in it being referred to a Full Bench for fresh consideration.

Phillips, Offg. C. J.—The question that has been referred for our opinion is "Is the decision in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathiram Kannot Cherukot (6) correct?"

In that decision it was held that, where a decree is passed against the karnavan of a tarwad in his representative capacity, all the members of the tarwad must be held to be parties to the suit and such members in execution proceedings must proceed under s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure and not under s. 278. The decree had been passed against the tarwad, but certain members of the tarwad objected to the attachment of certain properties on the ground that they belonged not to the tarwad, but to a separate tavazhi to which the claimants belonged. In order to consider the validity of this decision, it is necessary to consider the decision in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi, (7) which was relied on as authority for it. In Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) the decree had been passed against the karnavan of the tarwad as senior member and manager and it was held that members of the tarwad who claimed certain property in their individual right must be deemed to be parties, or representatives of parties, to the decree and, as such, any claim made by them came within s. 244 of the Civil Procedure Code (s. 47 of the present Code). The judgment is that of Shephard and Benson, J.J. Benson, J., who was also a party to Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathiram Kannot Cherukot (6) wrote the leading judgment in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) whereas Shephard, J., merely said: "I concur, though I must say that I have had considerable doubt about the question." The decision is based upon the Full Bench ruling in Vasudevan v. Sankaran (18) where it was held that a decree against the karnavan of a tarwad sued as such in a suit which he defended bona fide was binding on all the members of the tarwad, as they must be deemed to be represented in that suit by their karnavan. It must be observed that it was only as members of the tarwad that they were so represented and not in any other capacity that they might hold. Therefore, the decision in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) in which it was held that members of the tarwad in their individual capacity and not as members of the tarwad must also be deemed to be parties to the decree, is a considerable extension of the principle laid down in Vasudevan v. Sankaran (18). The karnavan undoubtedly represents the members of the tarwad as such, and the decision in Vasudevan v. Sankaran (18) is merely to that effect; but to go further and say that he represents them in any other capacity, e. g., as members of a separate tavazhi, or as individual owners, whose interests may be, and probably are, opposed to the interests of the tarwad, seems to be contrary to the principle of the decision. In fact, in Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levdai Morakayar (2) it was held by a Full Bench of this Court that when a decree had been obtained against a person in his individual capacity, a claim by him as a trustee for others who were not parties to the decree was one that fell under s. 278 of the Civil Procedure Code and not under s. 244. The ratio decidendi of this case is that the persons interested in the trust had not been parties to the decree and, consequently, were not bound by it, and, therefore, any claim made by them was a claim made by a stranger to the decree. It is difficult to distinguish this case on principle from Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathiram Kannot Cherukot (6) and Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7). As members of the tarwad, the claimants in both cases were deemed to be constructive parties to the decree; but their interests as members of a tavazhi or as individual owners were not represented at all in the suit, which was concerned merely with their interests as members of the tarwad. If they were not represented in their individual capacity in the suit, it is difficult to see how they could be deemed to be parties even constructively to the decree. They were not actual parties and, therefore, they could only come under s. 244 (now s. 47) if they were representatives of the parties; but it is not in their capacity as representatives of the parties that they now come forward with their claim, but as representing themselves, whose interests are adverse to those of the karnavan, who is deemed to be their representative in so far as they were members of the tarwad. Hence it would appear that they, in their individual capacity, were not represented in the suit and cannot, therefore, be held to be representatives of parties to the suit. The conclusion, therefore, is that, in accordance with the Full Bench decision in Ramanathan Chettiar v. Levvai Morakayar (2) the decisions in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) and Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) are wrong. If the claimants had been impleaded in the suit personally, they would undoubtedly be parties and would come within the meaning of s. 47, although the interests put forward in execution might not be the interests in respect of which they were made parties, for it has been held that, when a trustee is sued in his capacity as trustee and in execution puts forward his individual rights, he must be deemed to be a party to the suit also in his individual capacity. Where, therefore, a person is an actual party to the suit, his rights in any other capacity must be deemed to be rights of a party to the suit and he must, consequently, come under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code; but when he is not an actual party, but is merely a constructive party represented by another, he can only be deemed to be a party or representative of a party in the capacity in respect of which he was so represented. In any other capacity, more especially when such capacity is adverse to the person who represented him, he can in no sense be deemed to be a party to a decree or representative of a party.

The decision in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) has stood for many years and it is contended on the principle of stare decisis that it should be upheld. We see, however, that it was a decision of one Judge in which the second Judge reluctantly concurred. The correctness of the decision has also been doubted by the late Mr. Justice Sundara Ayyar in his Treatise on Malabar and Aliyasentana Law and he was undoubtedly a great authority on Malabar Law. The decision was also not followed in Pettikayilakath Mammad Haji v. Alam Ibran Haji (1) and in Second Appeal No. 1 of 1916 (unreported). If, therefore, the decisions are not correct in law they cannot be upheld, even though they relate merely to a question of procedure. On reference to the papers in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) it would appear that the karnavan of the tavazhi was an actual party to the decree and on that ground the decision may be correct; but as the judgment did not proceed upon that basis, we must answer the question referred to us in the negative, and this will have the further effect of overruling Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) also.

Beasley, J.—I agree.

Anantakrishna Ayyar, J.—I agree with my Lord. The circumstance that a money decree obtained against the tarwad karnavan as such is binding on all the members of the tarwad does not make the other members parties to the suit. Under ordinary circumstances their interests in the tarwad property should be deemed to have been represented by the karnavan, and it is only in this sense that the decree obtained against the karnavan in his representative capacity is binding on the other members: [Vasudevan v. Sankaran (18).] The karnavan is taken to sufficiently represent also their interests in the tarwad property, the interests of the karnavan and the junior members in respect of the tarwad property with reference to such suit being ordinarily the same. From this circumstance that the decree is thus binding on the tarwad including the interests of junior members in the tarwad properties, it does not follow that the junior members are parties to the suit. Similarly under s. 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, Explanation VI: "Where persons litigate bona fide in respect of a right claimed in common for themselves and others, all persons interested in such right shall, for purposes of this section, be deemed to claim under the person so litigating." This does not, I think, make all the other persons so interested parties to the suit.

It appears to me that it does not follow that because a decision is binding upon a person, therefore, he must be taken to be a party to the suit. Prima facie only those are parties to the suit within the meaning of s. 47, Civil Procedure Code, whose names appear in the decree. If any person's name so appears, then all questions raised by him relating to the execution, etc., of the decree should be determined in the execution department, and not by a separate suit. If his name does not so appear, then the next question is—were his interests (that is, those put forward by him) represented in the suit? He may have his own separate or private interests, and he may have his common interests in the tarwad properties as a member of the tarwad. If only his common interests in the tarwad were represented, then it seems to me it is impossible to hold that his other interest (separate and private interests) should also be taken to have been represented in the suit, with the result that if in execution proceedings occasion arises for putting forward such separate and private interests, he should be treated not as a stranger-qua such interests but as a party to the suit within the meaning of s. 47, Civil Procedure Code. The same remarks would apply to interests as co-owners possessed by two of the junior members of the tarwad in respect of some property owned by those two only as co-owners. The same remarks would also apply to properties owned by some only of the members of a tarwad as their exclusive tavazhi properties. It seems to me that in cases where such members were not eo-nomine parties to the decree, and where only the karnavan of the whole tarwad was sued as such, the claims that might be put forward in the course of execution of such decree by the joint co-owner members or the tavazhi members aforesaid should not be dealt with as put forward by persons who are parties to the suit. Ordinarily the karnavan of a tarwad, as such, has no concern with the private and separate properties of the junior members or of any tavazhi. But, on the other hand, it often happens that his interests as karnavan representing the tarwad are adverse to the separate interests put forward by the junior members or the tavazhi in the circumstances mentioned above. The present case is not even complicated by any permission of Court granted under O. I, r. 8, Civil Procedure Code. The decision in Marivittil Mathu Amma v. Pathram Kannot Cherukot (6) is based on the authority of the decision in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7): Justice Shephard had considerable doubt about the question. If the principle laid down by Benson, J., in Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) should be accepted, it would seem to follow that in the case of a decree obtained only against a Hindu father or joint family manager as such, claims preferred by other members of the joint family setting up private and exclusive right to properties attached would have to be decided under s. 47 of the Code; as also similar claims put forward by cestui que trust when their private and separate properties not included in the trust are sought to be proceeded against in execution of decrees obtained against the trustees only as such. I am not prepared to place such a construction on s. 47 which would involve the above consequences. In Kamal Kutti v. Ibrayi (7) the learned Judge argues: "If the decree can be executed against them (junior members) does not this imply that they are parties or representatives of parties?" With all respect, it is difficult to understand how a decree for money obtained against the karnavan alone as such could be executed against the junior members. Such a decree could be executed against the tarwad properties, but not against the junior members. If the learned Judge was right in saying that such a decree could be executed against the junior members, then the conclusion reached by him would, of course, be correct.

I accordingly agree in answering the question referred to us in the negative.

PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Bombay Land Revenue Code (V of 1879), ss. 3 (9), 66, 148—Use of agricultural land for building—Fine, whether leviable with reference to whole area—'Building site,' meaning of—'Adjacent,' construction of—Section 148, whether applicable.

The penalty leviable under s. 66 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code where a portion of land assessed or held for purposes of agriculture is used without the permission of the Collector for building purposes, is not to be levied with reference to the whole plot but only with reference to the area actually used for building purposes and it would be a question of fact in each case what area has been used for non-agricultural purposes. [p. 240, col. 2.]

What portion of an area falls within the term 'building site' is a question of fact depending upon the circumstances of each case. [ibid.]

The word 'adjacent' in the definition of the term 'building site' in s. 3, cl. (9) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code must be construed with reasonable limitations. [p. 241, col. 1.]

Section 148 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code is not applicable to fines levied under the provisions of s. 66 of the Code. [ibid.]

First appeal from the decision of the Joint Judge at Thana, in Civil Suit No. 17 of 1923.

JUDGMENT.

Crump, J.—The facts necessary for the decision of the present case may be briefly stated as follows:

The plaintiff purchased certain plot numbers in Survey No. 119 at Santa Cruz, and after his purchase he erected upon a portion of the total area a building covering 146 square yards. The exact area of the whole land need not necessarily be stated in the view which we take of the present case, but it may be said that it was very much larger than that, and that it was only a small portion that was covered by the building. That there was a previously existing structure used for agricultural purposes does not affect the present matter. It is conceded that the erection of this building was, so far as that portion of the land is concerned, a conversion of this agricultural holding to a non-agricultural purpose. Before the lower Court a question arose as to the altered assessment which in those circumstances might be levied under the provisions of s. 48 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. With that point we are not now concerned. It may, however, be remarked that the lower Court, relying upon what is now r. 81 of the Rules under s. 214 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, and also r. 85, held that the altered assessment could be levied upon the whole area and not merely upon the area occupied by the building. That point not being before us, we do not propose to express any opinion upon it, but speaking for myself, I must not be taken as acquiescing in the view taken by the lower Court.

What we are concerned with here is the fine which is admittedly payable by the respondent under the provisions of s. 66 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. That section lays down, reading it with s. 65, that if any land assessed or held for purposes of agriculture be used without the permission of the Collector for any other purpose than that of agriculture, then the person so using the land shall be liable to be summarily evicted by the Collector from the land so used and from the entire survey number, and shall also be liable to pay in addition to the new assessment which may be leviable under the provisions of s. 48 such fine as the Collector, subject to the general orders of Government, may direct. Now, the meaning of the section seems clear enough in itself. It contemplates plainly a survey number and a portion of a survey number which has been diverted from an agricultural purpose to some other purpose, which indeed is the case here. But it does not say in terms that the penalty leviable under the section can be levied with reference to the whole of the survey number. In order to decide what penalty is applicable, that is to say, with reference to what area it is to be calculated, we have to refer to r. 100 of the existing rules under s. 214. And assuming that this field comes within cl. (1), as we are told it does, the maximum would be Rs. 1,250, and it is leviable per acre of the land actually used for any purpose unconnected with agriculture and at the same rates in proportion as to any fraction of an acre. Therefore, it would be in each case a question of fact to be determined, what area has been used for any purpose unconnected with agriculture. The facts as disclosed in the present case are that, except for the area covered by the building, no use has been made of the rest of the land with the exception that occasionally vegetables are grown upon it. It is thus impossible to say that anything except the site has been diverted to a non-agricultural purpose. The fact that it has remained to a large extent unused for agriculture does not touch the matter, for the holder is not bound to cultivate the land. He can, if he likes, leave it uncultivated. Therefore, for the purposes of r. 100 considered in the light of the facts of this case, one would say that only the actual site is chargeable with fine. And that is the view which has been taken by the Court below.

But it has further been argued before us that we must have reference to r. 101, that we must regard this as a building site, and for the purpose of understanding what is meant by building site, we must refer to the definition in s. 3, cl. (9) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. That point was apparently never raised in the Court below, and whatever may be the definition in s. 3 (9), it must necessarily be a question of fact in each case to decide what portion of the area falls within the term 'building site.' Building site is there defined as a portion of land held for building purposes and it is said to include the open ground adjacent to any building erected thereupon. The word adjacent is extremely vague, and must necessarily be construed within reasonable limitations. And, in the absence of any inquiry directed to this point and of any evidence upon it, it would be impossible by the mere force of this definition to hold that the whole of this land should be regarded as a building site. Though we are not dealing with a penal statute in the strict sense of the word, nevertheless, this is in the nature of a penal statute; and, therefore, must be strictly considered in favour of the subject. Bearing that in mind it is not established in this case that the whole of this area should be regarded as building site within the definition contained in s. 3 (9), and, therefore, it is impossible to apply r. 100 in the sense in which it is desired to apply it.

A further point has been raised as regards the question of penalty. Section 148 is invoked. It is said that the case falls within that section, and the Collector, therefore, may impose as a penalty such amount as has been fixed from time to time under the orders of the Governor-in-Council. We may take it that the maximum penalty is one-fourth of the land revenue overdue. That is the result of the orders of Government to which we have been referred, and is indeed a matter of common knowledge among those who are familiar with revenue law, but before s. 148 can be invoked it is necessary that it should precisely apply to the facts of the present case. Section 148 deals with failure to pay instalments of land revenue within the prescribed time, and referring back to s. 146 where these land revenue instalments are introduced for the first time in the Act so far as I am aware, it is perfectly clear that what is meant by instalments of land revenue are those instalments of the total land revenue payable for the year which have to be paid at dates fixed from time to time by Government. So far as I understand the matter, s. 148 has no bearing whatever upon the question now before us. We are dealing here with a fine leviable under the provisions of s. 66, and I fail to see how that can be regarded in the light of an instalment of land revenue within the meaning of s. 146. That being so, s. 148 has no application to this case, and the further citation of s. 187 becomes meaningless; for that section merely provides the procedure by which monies leviable under the provisions of the Chapter can be recovered. Unless this penalty is so leviable s. 187 does not apply to it.

Those are the only two points that have been argued before us, and we think that upon both the points the decision arrived at by the lower Court is correct, and ought to be affirmed, and this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Marten, C. J.—I agree. The memorandum of appeal shows that in any event the plaintiff was entitled to be re-paid Rs. 473-1-6. That was because the Collector's notices were based on an erroneous area, viz., 3,146 square yards whereas the correct area was 2,043 square yards.

As regards the increased assessment which the lower Court has found to be leviable, there has been no appeal by the defendant, and I respectfully agree with what my brother Crump has said that under these circumstances it must not be taken that we acquiesce in the correctness of the decision on that point by the learned Judge.

Next, turning to the question of fine, in my opinion, the words "any such land" in s. 66 must be given the same meaning as the same words "any such land" in the concluding paragraph of s. 65. That takes us back to the second paragraph of s. 65, viz., "his holding or any part thereof." Consequently, as I read s. 66, it applies to the holding or such part thereof as has been used for non-agricultural purposes. User is, therefore, the test whether for the whole land or only a part. This construction of s. 66 is borne out by the provision that the Collector may eject from "the land so used," and also from the entire holding or survey number of which that particular portion forms part. On that construction I think the Collector had no power in law to impose the fine that he purported to do in the present case, for only a portion of the land was used for non-agricultural purpose, and not the whole.

I wish to add this. Speaking for myself I fully appreciate the importance of preventing the holders of Government land who have got that land on certain conditions, e. g., as agricultural land, from turning that land or any portion of it into land for non-agricultural purposes. But the penalty given by the Act must be fairly construed. Before us, the contention of the Government Pleader went to this extent, (if I understood it correctly), viz., that supposing there was a farm of 100 acres which according to him would form one "holding," and supposing a small summer-house or bathing hut or some other small non-agricultural building was put up on a few square yards of that farm, that would nevertheless result in an increased assessment for the whole 100 acres, and also in a liability to ejectment from the whole and in a liability to pay fine and penalty upon the whole. In my opinion that is not the true construction of the Act, although I quite appreciate that a tenant can be forced by proper means to keep his contract or be ejected, just as would be the case in an ordinary case of landlord and tenant where a tenant broke certain covenants of the lease, subject of course to the power of the Court to relieve from the forfeiture on certain equitable grounds.

As regards the penalty I entirely agree with my learned brother that that also is not leviable. Section 66 provides in effect penalties for a defaulting tenant. In my judgment it was never intended by s. 148 to pile penalty on the top of penalty in that indirect way. I agree that s. 148 has no application on the present case.

I concur, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 166, 181—Decree providing for sale of properties in particular order—Sale contrary to direction—Application to set aside sale—Limitation.

An application to set aside an execution sale on the ground that it was held in contravention of a direction in the decree that the properties should be sold in a certain order, falls under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and is governed by Art. 166 of Sch. I of the Limitation Act and not by Art. 181.

Appeal against an order of the District Court, East Tanjore at Negapatam, dated the 27th April, 1926, in O. M. A. No. 120 of 1925 preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Mayavaram, dated the 7th October, 1925, in E. A No. 530 of 1925, in E. P. No. 9 of 1925 in O. S. No. 39 of 1918 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif Shiyali.

Mr. C. A. Seshagiri Sastri, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the 4th defendant against the appellate order passed by the District Judge by which he confirmed the District Munsif's order refusing to set aside a sale in the following circumstances. A mortgage decree directed that items Nos. 1 to 3 of the mortgaged properties should be sold last and that item No. 4 should be sold first. Items Nos. 1 to 3 belonged to the present appellant. As regards item No. 4 an order staying sale had been obtained by the 1st defendant's son from the District Court on proceedings taken in connection with O. S. No. 119 of 1925 in which he claimed the 4th item as his own and asked for an injunction restraining its sale. The appellant though she had notice of the sale did not inform the Court that her properties were to be sold last according to the decree. Items Nos. 1 to 3 were sold in auction and then the appellant put in the present application under ss. 47 and 151, Civil Procedure Code, to set aside the sale on the ground that the sale is bad because it took place contrary to the direction in the decree that it should take place in a certain order. The lower Court held that the application is barred by limitation under Art. 166 of the Limitation Act as it had been filed admittedly more than 30 days after the date of sale.

It is argued that the sale in contravention of the directions in the decree amounts to an illegality, that it is, therefore, void ab initio and that the proper Article applicable is Art. 181 of the Limitation Act which prescribes a period of 3 years and not Art. 166. The question is whether the sale in the present case is an illegality or a mere irregularity. In Muthiah Chettiar v. Bawa Sahib (1) Oldfield, J., held that where a sale took place contrary to the directions in the decree that it should take place in a certain order, the application to set aside the sale on that ground was one under s.

(1) 26 Ind. Cas. 46; 27 M. L. J. 605.

47 of the Civil Procedure Code and would be governed by Art. 166. So far as we can see, there is nothing in Rajagopala Aiyar v. Ramanujachariar (2) which throws doubt on this decision. The observation of the learned Chief Justice "I cannot agree with the view that all applications under s. 47 are governed by Art. 165" rather suggests that some applications under that section are certainly governed by that Article. The present application though it was made under s. 47 was one to set aside a sale and is governed by Art. 166 of the Limitation Act. We think the present tendency is to apply Art. 166 to applications of this nature. The order of the lower Court is right and this appeal against appellate order is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 109—Appeal to Privy Council—Redemption decree—Extension of time by Appellate Court—Appellate decree, whether one of reversal—Burden of proof—Whole evidence adduced—Question of onus, whether material.

A decree of a High Court affirming a decree for redemption passed by a lower Court does not cease to be a decree of affirmance simply because a new date for redemption was fixed by the High Court and interest at the bond rate was made to run from the expiry of the date fixed by the lower Court till the date fixed by the High Court. [p. 244, col. 1.]

When the whole evidence is in, the question of onus of proof is merely academic. [p. 244, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

Mullick, Atg. C. J.—This is an application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council by Mahadeo Lal Marwari who was the unsuccessful appellant in Appeal No. 243 of 1922 before a Division Bench of this Court. The facts are these:

On the 22nd December, 1915, Mukemi Begum and four of her sons, namely, Amir Hussain, Lutof Ali, Davar Ali and Yavar Ali executed a mortgage bond for a sum of Rs. 1,35,000 in favour of Rai Bahadur Baijnath Goenka, the remaining son Tabarak Ali, not joining in the bond.

On the 10th February, 1916, the four sons, Amir Hussain, Lutof Ali, Davar Ali and Yavar Ali executed each a separate mortgage bond in respect of not only their interest in the properties covered by the bond of the 22nd December, 1915, but also in respect of some other properties in favour of Rai Bahadur Dalip Narayan Singh. The sums borrowed were respectively Rs. 50,000, Rs. 30,000, Rs. 16,000 and Rs. 10,000.

Rai Bahadur Dalip Narayan Singh then paid off the mortgage of the 22nd December, 1915, and brought a suit upon that mortgage as well as upon the four mortgages of the 10th February, 1916.

In the suit on the bond of 22nd December, 1915, he impleaded among others Tabarak Ali, who, though he had not joined in the bond, had, after Mukemi Begum's death, succeeded to her share in the property.

In the suit on Amir Hussain's bond the plaintiff added Mahadeo Marwari as a defendant because he had purchased Amir Hussain's interest.

Rai Bahadur Dalip Narayan obtained decrees upon all the bonds before the Subordinate Judge of Monghyr who among other things directed the sales in respect of the bonds of the 10th February, 1916, to be held subject to the sale in respect of the bond of the 22nd December, 1915.

Appeals were preferred to the High Court against the decree in each case, but we are concerned here only with Appeal No. 243. That appeal was dismissed, but the appellant Mahadeo Lal Marwari's Advocate Mr. Naresh Chandra Sinha among other things contended that the proper order was that only one sale should be held and that the fund should be distributed rateably after satisfying the first bond. The Division Bench accepted this contention and fixed a new date for redemption, six months from the date of its judgment. Upon the main question whether the principal defendants were liable for the mortgage money the Court found against them.

It is contended on behalf of Mahadeo Lal Marwari that, though the decision of the Division Bench was apparently one of affirmance, it was in reality a decision of reversal inasmuch as a new date for redemption has been fixed and interest at the bond rate has been made to run from the expiry of the date fixed by the trial Court till the date fixed by the Division Bench thereby imposing an additional liability of about Rs. 19,000 on the petitioner.

It is true that the High Court decree is for a larger amount than the trial Court's decree but that does not make the decision one of reversal, and one has to look at the substance of the matter. The petitioner was the appellant before the Division Bench and it was in consequence of his objection there that the mode of executing the decree was varied. It was open to him when pressing the objection to inform the Division Bench that he could not under any circumstances consent to an extension of the period of redemption. The Court was not bound to extend and if he had given the slightest inkling that he would let the property be sold rather than have an extra period of time for redemption the Court would, as it was bound to do, have acceded to his prayer. He cannot, in my opinion, appeal against an order which has been made for his benefit.

In substance, therefore, the decision is not one of reversal.

But the petitioner's real object in taking this point is to press his case as regards the merits.

His defence in the trial Court and also in the Appeal Court was that out of the consideration of Rs. 50,000 Amir Hussain got only Rs. 14,000 and that the balance of Rs. 36,000 was not accounted for. The Appeal Court examined this objection carefully and found on the facts that the alleged partial failure of consideration was not established.

The decision of the Division Bench was one of affirmance and the petitioner is not entitled to leave unless he can show a substantial point of law.

The petitioner then falls back upon his next point which is that even if the decision is one of affirmance, he has a substantial point of law inasmuch as the Division Bench has wrongly called upon the defendant to prove that the consideration money was not applied as alleged by the plaintiff. The answer to this is that when the whole evidence is in, the question of onus is merely academical. Further more having carefully considered the judgment of Mr. Justice Das, it does not appear that there is any substance in the point about onus.

The result is that the application for leave to appeal is dismissed with costs: hearing-fee five gold mohurs.

Co-sharers—Managing co-sharer—Power to grant lease for planting groves—Omission to raise objection to planting, whether creates estoppel.

The mere fact that a person manages property belonging to another does not clothe him with authority to grant leases of land for the purpose of planting groves. [p. 245, col. 2.]

The fact that a co-sharer did not raise any objection when a person, claiming under an unauthorised lease from another co-sharer began to plant groves does not estop him from claiming possession of the land. [p. 246, col. 1.]

Unless a person is found guilty of either an overt act or of an act of omission which is likely to induce the other side to believe that he is entitled to commit the particular act complained of, there can be no question of estoppel. [ibid.]

Appeal against the decree of a Subordinate Judge, Sitapur, in Civil Appeal No. 35 of 1926, dated the 11th March, 1927, upholding that of the Munsif, Biswan at Sitapur, in Regular Suit No. 37 of 1926, dated 7th September, 1926.

Messrs. M. Wasim and Khaliquzzaman, for the Appellants.

Mr. S. M. Ahmad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for possession of 1 bigha 14 biswas land in village Sheopuri, District Sitapur, by uprooting trees and for damages. The facts alleged by the plaintiffs are that the land in dispute is the joint land belonging to plaintiff No. 1 Ram Dat, plaintiff No. 2

Ram Ghulam and defendants Nos. 2 and 3, Bhagwati Prasad and Ram Autar respectively; that the said defendants wrongfully gave a lease of the said land to defendant No. 1, Ohhotak, for planting a grove thereon without their consent; and that the plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to recover possession of the land by uprooting trees planted by defendant No. 1 thereon. The plaintiffs also claimed a sum of Rs. 50 as damages.

The defence put forward by defendant No. 1 was to the effect that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 managed the share of the village in which the land in dispute lies on behalf of the plaintiffs and, therefore, the lease granted by defendants Nos. 2 and 3 was a good and valid lease binding on them. It was also contended by him that the plaintiffs were estopped from claiming possession of the land in suit since they had not objected to defendant No. 1's planting trees on the land in dispute when he had obtained the lease of the said land. Defendants Nos. 2 and 3 admitted the fact of having given the lease of the land in suit to defendant No. 1 but alleged that while giving the lease they had told him that he must obtain the consent of the plaintiffs in respect of their share.

The learned Munsif of Biswan, District Sitapur, who tried the case held that the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 used to manage the share of the plaintiffs in the village Sheopuri and were, therefore, justified in giving the lease of the land for the purpose of planting a grove thereon. He, however, held that the plea of estoppel could not be maintained. In this view of the case he dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

In appeal the learned Subordinate Judge of Sitapur agreed with the learned Munsif's finding that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 used to manage the share of the village in which the land in dispute lies on behalf of the plaintiffs and that they were, therefore, competent to grant the alleged lease to defendant No. 1. He, however, differed from the Munsif on the question of estoppel and held that the plaintiffs not having objected to defendant No. 1's planting the trees at the time when the lease was granted to him were now estopped from bringing the present suit. Upon these findings he confirmed the decree passed by the learned Munsif and dismissed the appeal.

The plaintiffs have now come up to this Court in second appeal, and the learned Pleader on their behalf has urged two points in support of the appeal: Firstly, that there is no proof on the record that the plaintiffs had authorised defendants Nos. 2 and 3 to grant a lease of the land in dispute for the purpose of planting a grove and that the mere fact that the said defendants managed the property on the plaintiffs' behalf would not be a sufficient ground in law to give them an authority to grant a lease of the land for the purpose of planting a grove thereon. Secondly, that the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge on the question of estoppel was erroneous.

As to the first point I am of opinion that the contention urged on behalf of the appellants is sound and must be given effect to. I do not find any evidence on the record showing that the plaintiffs had expressly authorised defendants Nos. 2 and 3 to give a lease of the land in suit on their behalf for the purpose of planting a grove thereon. The Courts below, it appears to me, have inferred this authority from the fact that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 used to manage the property on the plaintiffs' behalf and also from the fact that the plaintiffs did not object to the planting of the trees at the time when the alleged lease of the land in dispute was given to defendant No. 1. I do not agree with this view of the Court below. In my opinion the mere fact that a person manages the property belonging to another does not clothe him with authority to grant leases of land for the purpose of planting groves. The ordinary incidence of management would include the power to realise rent and power to give ordinary leases of land to tenants for the purpose of cultivation. I am unable to agree with the view taken by the Courts below that the power of management also includes the power to grant perpetual leases for the purpose of planting groves. It has been held in several cases that a lambardar has no power to grant a perpetual lease on behalf of his co-sharer, and I am, therefore, inclined to think that land cannot similarly be let by a manager for the purpose of planting a grove thereon without the express permission of the principal. Plaintiff No. 1 further gave his own evidence to the effect that when defendant No. 1 proceeded to plant trees on the land in dispute he at once objected. His story has not, however, been believed by the Courts below. Apart from that fact it appears to me that even if we assume that plaintiffs did not object to defendant No. 1's planting trees on the land in suit at the time of the grant of the lease, that would not be any evidence of the fact that they had authorised defendants Nos. 2 and 3 to give such a lease on their behalf. There being no presumption that the authority to manage would also imply the authority to give lands for the purpose of planting groves, it was the bounden duty of defendant No. 1 to give clear proof of such authority. There being no such proof I am unable to infer such authority from the facts proved in the case. I, therefore, hold that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 had no authority to give defendant No. 1 the lease of the land in dispute for the purpose of planting a grove thereon.

As to the second point, I am of opinion that the plea of estoppel cannot be maintained. The law on the subject is laid down very clearly by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Beni Ram v. Kundan Lal (1) and Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (2). The principle enunciated by their Lordships in those cases is that unless a person is found guilty of either an overt act or of an act of omission which is likely to induce the other side to believe that he is entitled to commit the particular act complained of, there can be no question of estoppel. In one of the cases recently decided by a learned Judge of this Court in Mustafa Husain v. Saidul Nisan (3), it was held that a plea of estoppel in such cases can only be maintained if the conduct of the person against whom the estoppel is alleged, is found to be fraudulent. I am unable to find such elements proved in the case. I, therefore, overrule the plea of estoppel.

It now remains to be seen whether on the above findings the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for possession. At the last hearing of the case after I had heard arguments on both sides I intimated to the parties that I had come to the conclusion that the fair arrangement which should be arrived at in this case would be to allow defendant No. 1 Chhotak to remain in possession of the land in dispute on which he has already planted a grove and to ask him to pay to plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 their share of rent of the land and to allow the burden of the transfer made by defendants Nos. 2 and 3 to fall upon their share at the time of partition. The plaintiffs not having come to Court at once and the land being a joint one, I intimated to the parties my opinion that they must seek their remedy at the time of partition. To this arrangement the parties agreed. In view of such agreement I thought it proper that I should myself determine the amount of rent which defendant No. 1 should pay to the plaintiffs for the use of the land in dispute. With this object I ordered the Patwari of the village to be summoned before the Court. The evidence of the Patwari was recorded and after he had been examined the learned Pleader for the plaintiffs and the learned Counsel for defendant No. 1 agreed that the fair and equitable rent for the land in suit would be at the rate of Rs. 3 per pucca bigha. The land in dispute consists of four plots, namely, No. 701/1 (11 biswas), No. 701/2 (10 biswas) and No. 702/1 (3 biswas), all measuring 24 biswas; and No. 708/2 (10 biswas). The share of plaintiff No. 1 in the first three plots is one-third and the share of plaintiff No. 2 in them is one-sixth; and the share of plaintiff No. 2 in the fourth plot is 5/18ths, there being no share of plaintiff No. 1 in the said plot. Calculating the rent at the aforesaid rate the share of plaintiff No. 1 comes to Rs. 1-3 odd but for facility of account I fix the rent at Rs. 1-4. The share of plaintiff No. 2 comes to about Re. 1 but for facility of account I fix it exactly at Re. 1. Defendant No. 1 will, therefore, pay Rs. 2-4 on account of rent of the land in dispute in this way that he will pay Rs. 1-4 to plaintiff No. 1 and Re. 1 to plaintiff No. 2. Defendant No. 1 will be allowed to remain in possession of the plots in suit as long as he continues to pay the said rent. If at any time he fails to pay the rent to plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 he will be liable to ejectment from the land in suit to the extent of their shares. The plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 will also be entitled to get a decree for Rs. 5 as damages.

I, therefore, allow the appeal to the extent indicated above.

As to costs my order is that owing to the circumstances in the case the parties should bear their own costs throughout.

Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 72—Consignor sending illiterate person to deliver goods—Signature of such person to Risk Note, whether binding on consignors—Condition of package—Consignor agreeing in Risk Note that condition was unsatisfactory—Subsequent plea to the contrary, whether allowable.

If a consignor sends another person to deliver goods to a Railway Administration and that person signs the contract, the contract so signed by that person is binding upon the consignor as though he had signed it himself. It is immaterial whether that person was literate or illiterate, was authorised to sign or not authorised, or signed personally or as agent of the consignor. [p. 248, col. 1.]

If at the time of booking the Railway Company was dissatisfied and the person delivering the goods for carriage agreed that the condition of the packages was not satisfactory, it cannot afterwards be made a matter of objection in a suit upon the contract that the packages were in good condition. JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This is the defendants' appeal in a suit brought by consignees of goods which were despatched by the defendants' Railway from the Victoria Terminus in Bombay to Kushtea—a station on the Eastern Bengal Railway. Two consignments of yarn are involved in the case. These goods had been sent out from England and were consigned from Bombay to Kushtea without being re-packed. It appears that the yarn was contained in wooden cases and these wooden cases had gunny coverings as to which there is certain evidence that the coverings were old and torn. On the arrival of the goods at Kushtea, it was found that, as regards the first consignment, certain of the goods were damaged and that, as regards the second consignment, certain of the goods were damaged and certain parts of the contents had been lost.

The firm of Mr P. N. Mehta and Company were sending these goods to the plaintiffs. P. N. Mehta and Company had a Manager or Managing Director Mr. Parekh. It is quite clear that when the carters brought the goods to the Railway Station, some person in charge of the goods employed an individual called Gangaram Punaji to act as muccadam, that is to say, to be the forwarding agent despatching the goods on the Railway. The consignors defendants say that the muccadam whom they were in the habit of employing was another individual altogether and they say that they gave no authority to any one to get Gangaram Punaji to do any work for them. It is in no way explained how the carter or foreman came to employ Gangaram Punaji or, owing to what circumstances or under what instructions, Gangaram Punaji was employed; but it is quite clear that he was the person who, in fact, delivered these goods for carriage to the defendants' Railway. When he did so deliver the goods, the Railway Company took the view that the cases were damaged and defective. Gangaram Punaji agreed and signed the Risk Note in Form A. As regards the second consignment, Risk Notes both in Form A and Form B were signed by Gangaram Punaji. So far as the Risk Note B is concerned, it is clear that the rate of freight would be less; so far as the Risk Note in Form A is concerned, it does not appear that the rate of freight would be less, though in such circumstances the consideration for which Risk Note A is executed is that it obviates the expense of putting the packages into proper condition before consignment and also that the sender gains in the matter of weight upon which freight has to be charged. In this case, what happened was that these goods were damaged in the process of carriage and the suit was brought against the several Railways concerned in the carriage. Ultimately, it has been decreed against the appellant Railway only—the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company—which was the railway to whom the goods were handed over.

The first question which arises is this: It is said that Gangaram Punaji had no authority from the consignors and that his signature does not bind the consignor. It is said, secondly, that he was a man who could not read English and that it is not shown whether he knew what he was signing. As regards the Risk Note A, it is said that the learned Judge has found as a fact that the goods were, in proper packing cases, that there was no defect in the packing, and that the defendant Railway can, therefore, take no advantage from the Risk Note in Form A.

These questions turn upon s. 72 of the Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890). By that Act, the responsibility of a Railway Company is prima facie the responsibility of a bailee under ss. 152 and 161 of the Indian Contract Act, but agreement may be made limiting that responsibility and "an agreement purporting to limit that responsibility shall, in so far as it purports to affect such limitation, be void, unless it is in writing signed by or on behalf of the person sending or delivering to the Railway Administration the animals or goods, and is otherwise in a form approved by the Governor-General in Council." The phrase "the person sending or delivering to the Railway Administration" is an important phrase in the Indian Railways Act. It appears in more than one section in one form or another. Its equivalent is to be found in s. 58 and also in ss. 73 and 75. As a matter of fact, it would appear that the phrase is taken from s. 7 of the English Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854, where the words of the last proviso are: "Unless the same be signed by him or by the person delivering such animals, articles, goods or things respectively for carriage." Now, it is quite clear that a Railway Company when goods are tendered to it for carriage cannot hold an inquest as to the right of the person delivering to deal with the goods, the property in the goods or the authority given by the owner to the person presenting the articles for carriage; and, when one comes across the phrase "the person sending or delivering to the Railway Administration" it is clear that this fact is being recognised by the Statute. Under the same words in England, no difficulty has apparently been found. I find in English text books that this matter is treated as clear upon the face of s. 7 of the Act of 1854. I find, for instance, in Disney's Law of Carriage by Railway, 6th Edition, at page 37: "The consignor, therefore, may be bound not only by the signature of himself or his agent but also by the signature of the person who delivers the goods to the Company whether, in fact, that person had authority to sign or not." In Alan Leslie's Law of Transport by Railway, the matter is put thus: "The section further provides that the contract may be signed not merely by 'the party' but also by 'the person delivering (the goods) for carriage.' Such person has, therefore, not merely such authority to bind the sender as naturally arises from his position as agent but an absolute statutory authority to bind him and it seems that prima facie, he has authority to sign any form of contract." The English cases in which this matter has been more specifically dealt with are three in number: Kirby v. G. W. Ry. (1), Foreman v. G. W. Ry. (2) and Aldridge v. G. W. Ry. (3). There can, therefore, be no doubt that when Gangaram Punaji tendered these goods to the Railway Company he had, so far as any question of contract with the Railway for carriage is concerned, power under the Statute to sign the Risk Notes so as to bind the consignor. If, of course, the question were not a question upon a contract of bailment or affreightment but this suit were a suit by a person claiming in detinue or trover against the Railway Company for having in possession goods belonging to the plaintiff without his authorisation, different principles would apply. That is not the nature of this suit which is a suit on the contract by the consignees.

The next question is this: It is said that because Gangaram Punaji signed not merely his own name but his own name with the addition of "agent for P. N. Mehta & Co." that vitiates the contract. I am of opinion that there is no reasonable ground for this contention. The Risk Notes in this case were signed by the person delivering the goods within the meaning of the section.

So far as regards Risk Note A, there is a finding by the learned Judge that "the cases were in perfect, good and sound condition when they were booked." It does not seem to me that the learned Judge has found that with regard to the coverings as distinct from the cases, but it must be reasonably clear that, if at the time of booking the Railway Company was dissatisfied and the person delivering the goods for carriage agreed that the condition of the packages was not satisfactory, it cannot afterwards be made a matter of objection in a suit upon the contract that the packages were in good condition. A person cannot hold to a part of a contract and reject the rest unless there is statutory authority for so doing. In this particular case, what have to be applied are the terms of cl. (b) of sub-s. (2) of s. 72 of the Indian Railways Act. The contract has to be otherwise in a "form approved by the Governor-General in Council." In this case, the contract was in such a form. Whether any of the authorised forms are to be used, and if so, which, is a matter left by the Statute to the parties. In my judgment, it is not open in a suit of this kind to reject the terms of the Risk Note in the manner which is contended for.

(3) (1864) 15 C. B. (N. S.) 582; 33 L. J. C. P. 161; 143 E. R. 913; 137 R. R. 667.

The learned Judge in dealing with this case has committed himself to a certain amount of advice to Railway Companies and to a statement of the law which cannot, in my opinion, be accepted. Apart from holding that the Railway Company have to prove the authority of the person delivering the goods, he has gone on to say that the Company must satisfy the Court that the person who signed it knew the terms of the contract and that the contract should be explained to him. He admits that this may be inconvenient but thinks it necessary in law, when a contract is entered into by an ignorant person. The learned Judge in this respect is entirely mistaken. It is well held in England—and the rule is the same in India—that, if a person being illiterate signs a contract thinking it to be of a different character altogether from what it is in fact or if any misrepresentation is made to him as to what he is signing then no doubt the signature will not be binding on him; but it is quite wrong to suppose that it is the legal duty of a Railway Company to see whether the person delivering the goods is ignorant or not or to see that he reads and understands before he signs. It has been held in England that, if a consignor who can read sends an illiterate person to deliver goods to a Railway Administration and that person signs the contract, the contract so signed by that person is binding on the consignor as though he has signed it himself [Kirby v. G. W. Ry. (1)]. Apart from the question of authority to sign, the ordinary law of the land is applicable to a case of this kind and a very good statement of it can be found in Pollock and Mulla's Contract Act in the notes to s. 13. Ignorant people are very commonly sent to deliver certain classes of goods and animals for transit by Railway, e. g., grooms, drivers, carters. It is for the sender if he is not satisfied of their competence to give them instructions or assistance. It is quite wrong to treat a Railway Company in a case of this kind as though it were dealing with a parda-nashin woman and taking a transfer of her estate, or as a person in a fiduciary relation to the consignor of the goods.

In the present case Gangaram was professing to be a forwarding agent and might well be very familiar with Railway forms in the vernacular translation.

The only other question that seems to call for observation is whether or not it is open to the defendants now to maintain that the plaintiffs have not proved under Risk Note B that the goods which were not delivered were lost. In my judgment, that is not open in this case because it is evident particularly from the judgment of the trial Court—that it was in no way in dispute: indeed it could not well be in dispute—that the goods which were short delivered having fallen out of damaged cases were goods lost and the appellants on this point cannot be allowed to make a new case.

In my judgment, the appeal should be allowed and the suit should be dismissed with costs in all the Courts as against the defendants appellants. As regards the other defendants, the judgment of the learned District Judge will stand.

Mitter, J.—I agree.

(I of 1872), s. 114.*

There is a presumption of fact that a document signed by a person was voluntarily signed by him, and failure of the lower Court to invoke a presumption of fact of this kind is a ground for second appeal. [p. 251, col. 2; p. 252, l.]

Per Ashworth, J.—The distinction between a mere inference and a presumption of fact is that a presumption of fact is an inference drawn under s. 114 of the Evidence Act. A presumption of fact would also include anything that in English Law would rank as a presumption of law. [p. 251, col. 1.]

Second appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Benares, confirming that of the City Munsif.

Mr. Kamla Kant Verma, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. C. Vaish, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Ashworth, J.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought by the respondents Nanku and Sukhu, against one Sitaram, appellant, for a declaration that a sale-deed purporting to have been executed on the 2nd of June, 1923 by Deosaran defendant No. 2 (i. e., respondent No. 3) was forged, fraudulent and fictitious. The suit was decreed by the trial Court on a finding that the defendant Sitaram had failed to prove the due execution of the deed by Deosaran his vendor.

On first appeal the Subordinate Judge of Benares found that there had been no clear issue in the trial Court as to forgery, and that, by reason of the absence of a clear issue, the defendant No. 1 may have been led into supposing that he was not required to produce evidence of due execution of the deed by Deosaran. He accordingly framed an issue whether the sale-deed was genuine and had been executed by Deosaran, and took fresh evidence.

The defendant Sitaram produced a finger impression expert. He gave evidence that the thumb-impression on the deed purporting to be that of Deosaran agreed with the undoubted thumb-impressions tendered in evidence. He also produced the scribe by name Bishunath Singh and one Ram Sundar, who purported to be an attesting witness. The conclusion of the Subordinate Judge, after hearing this evidence, was that (a) the thumb-impression on the deed did agree with Deosaran's thumb-impression, (b) that the thumb impression suggested that one of the thumb-impressions of Deosaran was taken on the top of another thumb impression of Deosaran, (c) that the scribe could not be believed, because he being a man of experience would never have allowed one thumb-impression to be taken on the top of another, but in the event of the first impression being obscure would have taken a second one on a different portion of the paper, and (d) that the other witness contradicted one another and the scribe. On these findings the lower Appellate Court came to an extraordinary conclusion. It was that somehow or other the thumb-impression of Deosaran had been fraudulently obtained upon the document, and that the defendant had failed to show that it was Deosaran's thumb-impression voluntarily impressed on the document. In order to give any meaning to this decision we have to suppose that the Subordinate Judge conceived the possibility either of a die having been made from some other thumb-impression of Deosaran and a forged impression by means of the die impressed on the document in question or that Deosaran's thumb-impression had been obtained when he was asleep or drunk.

The first question that arises in this appeal is whether in these circumstances we are entitled in second appeal to interfere with the finding of the Subordinate Judge. There can be no question that it was a finding of fact. As I shall subsequently show, the error of the lower Appellate Court was its failure to invoke a presumption of fact. The question then arises whether such a failure justifies interference in second appeal. The question has not been discussed at length in any decisions to which my attention has been directed. There is authority for holding that a second appeal may be entertained on the ground that the lower Appellate Court has failed to invoke a presumption of fact which would have shifted the burden of proof. A distinction, however, should, in my opinion, be made where the burden of proof is shifted by a presumption of fact, and where it is shifted by a mere inference. In the case of Ranee Surnomoyee v. Luchmeeput Doogur (1) a second appeal was allowed on the ground that the burden of proof which originally was placed on the husband of a Muhammadan wife to prove some property his, because the property was in the name of the wife, was shifted from him upon proof by him that he had paid the purchase price for the property and had had the property under his control. This decision was by no less an authority than Peacock, C. J. He held that a question of law was involved, because the Judge should have directed himself to draw this presumption from the facts mentioned. Again in Nilatachi v. Venkatachala Mudali (2) it was held that silence on the part of the plaintiffs to take a step to claim property in the enjoyment of the defendant and over which the defendant was exercising acts of ownership raised a presumption of acquiescence. Both these cases go further than I should be disposed to go; for they interfered on the ground of failure to draw what I should regard as a mere inference and not as a presumption of fact. They are, however, both clear authority for interference in the present case. The distinction that I would draw between a mere inference and a presumption of fact, as already indicated, is that a presumption of fact is an inference drawn under s. 114 of the Evidence Act and will include a presumption of the nature described in the illustrations. A presumption of fact should in my opinion, also include anything that in English Law (though not under the Indian Evidence Act) would rank as a presumption of law. The presumption which the lower Appellate Court failed to make in this case was a presumption that when signature on a document is proved by a certain person, it is for that person to prove that it was affixed by him otherwise than voluntarily. According to Taylor on Evidence, Third Edition, page 145, "Courts of Law are in general bound to presume prima facie in favour of deeds which appear to have been duly executed." "Appear" must mean here which bear a proved signature. The presumption then which the lower Appellate Court, I shall hold, ought to have made was a presumption that in England would have been a presumption of law. It is difficult to find a formula to express the difference between presumptions of fact of the nature indicated by me and mere inferences. Phipson in his work on Evidence says: "The burden of proof may be shifted not alone by rebuttable presumptions of law but by presumptions of fact of the stronger kind or indeed by any species of evidence sufficient to raise a prima facie case."

My conclusion then is that a second appeal lies on the ground of the failure of the lower Appellate Court to invoke a presumption of fact "of the stronger kind" (by which I mean inferences of the nature illustrated in s. 114 of the Evidence Act and inferences that in English Law would be legal presumptions), and that there is even authority for holding that the failure of the lower Appellate Court to draw any mere inference that it should have drawn would justify interference in second appeal, though I would not follow authority to this extent. The consequence is that in this case a second appeal, in my opinion, lies.

It appears desirable to state that the probabilities were all against this document being a forgery. Deosaran had mortgaged his land to the defendant Sitaram on the 12th of August, 1915, for Rs. 300. It is said that, by this sale-deed now impeached, on the 2nd of June, 1923, he sold the equity of redemption to Sitaram for another Rs. 400. Then we get the fact that he executed a further sale-deed in favour of the plaintiffs Nanku and Sukhu, on the 5th of June, 1923. He got by this last sale-deed a sum of Rs. 1,100. Consequently it was all to the interest of Deosaran to deny his execution of the sale deed, impeached in the present suit, and no one could place any reliance on his evidence. It does not appear that the Subordinate Judge did place any reliance on his evidence, but the case started with the probability in favour of the execution of the impeached document having been executed being greater than the reverse. Then we get the clear evidence of the thumb-impression expert that the thumb-impression mark on the document corresponds to Deosaran's genuine thumb-impression. This evidence is of much more value than the ordinary evidence of an expert. We are not aware that the test of similarity has ever failed. The Subordinate Judge admitted that this evidence conclusively proved the thumb-mark to correspond with that of Deosaran. This being so, he had evidence of a document which in other respects was not open to suspicion and was not improbable. He attempts to discount the evidence of the thumb-impression expert by his own impression that one thumb mark had been placed on the top of another. This impression is not one that we are disposed to share. It was not shared by the thumb-impression expert himself. It appears then to us that at this stage it was for the plaintiffs to show that the thumb-impression of Deosaran had been obtained by some improper means either when he was asleep or in some such way. There was a presumption of fact that the document which bore his thumb-impression was voluntarily executed by him. Instead of invoking this presumption the lower Appellate Court proceeded to require the defendant to produce all his evidence, and on the ground that this evidence was discrepant it found that the defendant had failed to prove the genuineness of the document. This we consider to have been a failure to invoke the presumption that arose from the proof of the thumb-impression on the document being the thumb-impression of Deosaran. It is obvious that if a person, who has proved execution by showing that a signature or thumb-impression on a deed is the signature or thumb-impression of the alleged executant, is required to go on and prove, after a considerable lapse of time, due execution by putting forward an attesting witness and other witnesses whose story will agree in every detail, there will be a great risk of injustice and an intolerable burden thrown upon the parties setting up a document. This was not a document which required attestation. The lower Appellate Court should have in the circumstances of the case rested content with proof of the thumb-impression of Deosaran in the absence of the plaintiffs being able to produce any evidence that the thumb-impression was improperly obtained. I consider, therefore, that the finding of the lower Appellate Court, though a finding of fact, was one based on its failure to presume the genuineness of the document in the absence of any evidence believed by the Court led by the plaintiffs to prove that the deed was otherwise than properly executed. For these reasons, we would allow the appeal and dismiss the suit with costs throughout.

(2) 1 M. H. C. R. 131.

Kendall, J.—I agree. The lower Appellate Court has found that Deosaran's thumb-impression is on the sale-deed in suit. It did not, therefore, rely on the evidence of Deosaran himself in the first Court to the effect that he had not put his thumb-mark on the sale-deed. Having arrived at this decision the lower Appellate Court had no evidence whatever produced before it on which it could base a finding that the thumb-impression of Deosaran was put on the sale-deed in any irregular manner, and that finding is, therefore, not based on any evidence. For this reason I agree that we are justified in interfering with the decision of the lower Court in second appeal.

Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 72—Risk Note Form B—Suit for damages for non-delivery—Burden of proof of loss—'Loss,' meaning of.

In a suit against a Railway Company for damages for non-delivery of part of a consignment, unless the fact of the loss is admitted by the plaintiff, it is necessary for the Railway Company, to get the benefit of the clause in Risk Note B which exempts it from liability for loss, to show that the goods are lost, or at least to show, in the first instance that the goods are not then and there in the control of the Railway Administration, so that they might have been delivered to the proper consignee. JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal by the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company Limited against a decree whereby they have been ordered to pay compensation to the plaintiff in respect of non-delivery of part of two bales of piece-goods. It would appear that the goods in question were forwarded in two consignments delivered to the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company at the Victoria Terminus in Bombay in November and December respectively of 1920. For the present purpose it need only be stated that these goods were consigned upon the terms of the Risk Note B—a form of note approved by the Governor-General in Council under s. 72 of the Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890).

The first question which has been raised by the Railway Company in this appeal has reference to the point decided against it in the lower Court that the Risk Note B is not applicable to the case. The contention that the Risk Note is not applicable to the case arises out of the circumstance that the person who actually tendered the goods to the Railway Company for carriage signed his name on behalf of O. Karnani in the place provided for the signature of the sender. The Courts below have held that as it is not shown that he had authority of the sender to sign his name the Risk Note is invalid and does not apply in the present case. That contention which is of great importance to the Railway Company and which no doubt accounts for this matter being brought before this Court. I do not think it necessary to decide. I will only say that it seems to me that there is much to be said on behalf of the Railway Company before such a contention can be accepted. I pass from that matter because, in my judgment, that important question does not arise at all. We ought not, therefore, to decide it.

Assuming that Risk Note B applies, the learned Advocate for the respondent contends that the judgment of the lower Appellate Court is right in this respect that the burden was on the Railway Company independently altogether of the exception clause in the form, to show that there had been a loss of part of these two bales in the present case. Now, when one turns to Risk Note B, one finds that it is a limit put upon the general liability of the Railway Company. That general liability is not the liability known to English Common Law as the liability of a common carrier, but is the liability of a bailee as defined in ss. 152 and 161 of the Contract Act; in other words, the Railway Company is not an insurer but is under the duty of taking a certain measure of reasonable care. The purpose of Risk Note B is to provide that notwithstanding there may have been a breach of the duty to take reasonable care, the Railway Company shall not be liable for certain things except in certain special cases. The form says that the Railway Company shall not be legally liable for the following things or any of them, namely, "any loss, destruction, or deterioration of or damage to the said consignment." There is an exception which does not apply in the present case at all because to come within that exception there must be "a loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages." But although that exception does not in the present case apply the language of it throws some light upon the meaning of the previous words in the form—upon the meaning, in particular, of the words "any loss" in the previous part of it. The exception speaks of a loss, "due either to the wilful neglect of the Railway Administration, or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants," and so forth. It is clear, therefore, that as the word "loss" is used in the form there may be a loss although it is caused by theft of the servants of the Railway Administration or its agents, and there may be a loss although it is due to wilful neglect of the Railway Administration itself.

We have, therefore, to apply in the light of the language used in the exception the phrase "any loss, destruction or deterioration of, or damage to, the said consignment." If the plaintiff's claim were for damages for the Railway Company's damaging the consignment, damages for the deterioration of the goods comprised in the consignment or damages for the destruction of the consignment, then prima facie the contract itself would be a complete answer and the plaintiff need not get on at all unless he got on the exception clause. The plaintiff's case is for damages for non-delivery of part of the consignments and the questions arise, first whether it is necessary that it should be shown that there has, in fact, been a loss of part of the consignments and, secondly, whether the burden of showing that there has been a loss is on the Railway Company or on the plaintiff. Both these matters are covered by decisions of Courts co-ordinate with this Court. The form says that the Railway Company is to be "harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss," and, therefore, it is prima facie for the Railway Company to bring itself within that warranty. It is not necessary in the present case to endeavour to define what circumstances would come under the word "loss." If, for example, the Railway Company by negligence or mistake had parted with the goods to a wrong consignee I am very far from holding that that would not be "loss" within the meaning of the section. If the Railway Company still had the goods under its control and could have produced them or if the Railway Administration had converted them to its own use as distinct from some servant of theirs converting them in wrong of his masters to his own use, again it would not appear that the circumstances would be covered by the phrase "any loss." It is, however, necessary for the Railway Company, to get the benefit of this warranty, to show that the goods are lost, at least to show in the first instance that the goods are not then and there in the control of the Railway Administration, so that they might have been delivered to the proper consignee. In my judgment, therefore, on both the propositions—the necessity of showing that there has been a loss and that the initial burden of proof is on the Railway Company the cases which I shall now refer to have to be followed.

The first case is the case of Ghelabhai Pansi v. East Indian Ry., Co. (1) which was a decision of Chief Justice Sir Norman Macleod and Mr. Justice Shah. That case proceeds upon certain English cases and upon a previous Bombay case decided by Mr. Justice West in 1883. It definitely lays down the principle that the burden is on the Railway Company to show that the goods have been lost. Mr. Justice West's language is this: "The natural presumption under such circumstances is that all the goods, arrived, and that the Company was in a position to deliver them." The reasoning of that case is followed by a Division Bench of this Court presided over by Mr. Justice Suhrawardy and Mr. Justice Page in the case of East Indian Ry., Co. v. Jagpat Singh (2) and it was this case which was really in the mind of the lower Appellate Court which decided the present case. Again in the case of Gopiram Behariram v. Agent, E. I. Ry. (3), Acting Chief Justice Chatterjee and Mr. Justice Cuming held that "before the plaintiff is called upon to prove that the goods were lost by the wilful neglect of, or theft by, the Railway servants, it must be shown that the goods have been lost; and unless the fact of the loss is admitted by the plaintiff, the onus is, in the first instance, on the Railway Administration to prove that the goods have been lost and it will be then for the plaintiff to show that the loss was due to the wilful neglect of, or theft by, the Railway servants." That statement of law does not take account of the fact that the exception clause in Risk Note B, as it then stood, covered cases only where a complete consignment or package, part of the consignment, had been lost. Otherwise, it is in entire agreement with the other cases I have cited.

We have to consider whether we should depart from these authorities. In my judgment, it must be that the Railway Company seeking the advantage of the guarantee that they will be held harmless for certain things must have the duty, in the first instance, of bringing themselves within the language of that guarantee. I have considered whether the reasoning in the Bombay case and in the subsequent cases in so far as they proceed upon English cases and the Indian cases prior to the Indian Railways Act of 1890 should be discredited from on the ground that prior to 1890 in India and up to the present time in England the liability of a Railway in respect of goods in the absence of a special agreement would be that of a common carrier. No doubt, in these circumstances, it is easier to say that the burden of proof is, in the first instance, on the plaintiff. It seems to me, however, that where the general liability of a Railway Company is merely that of taking a certain measure of reasonable care it is still correct to say that prima facie, until certain other facts are proved, the Railway Company taking reasonable care of goods would have them at the end of the journey to deliver to the consignee. Even although the Railway Company is not any longer a common carrier in India it is, in my opinion, still right to say that the Railway Company, to get the benefit of the special contract in this Risk Note, must bring itself under the terms of the warranty and prove, unless it is admitted, that there has been a loss. In my judgment this consideration concludes the present, appeal.

(2) 79 Ind. Cas. 126; 51 C. 615; 23 C. W. N. 1001; A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 725.

It has been pointed out that in the trial Court not much attention appears to have been paid to this particular point. It is not shown to us, however, that in the plaint there was any admission that the goods had been lost and the form of the issue is such that the Railway Company is not entitled to assume that it did not have to prove that the goods had been lost. No doubt, the point in many cases—and probably in this case—is a purely technical one. It may well be that the Railway Administration would have had no difficulty at all in showing that at the time these goods should have been delivered, they were lost to the Railway Administration. The Railway Company must remember when defending suits under this Risk Note what the law is. They must take proper measures to show at all events that the goods were lost to the Railway Administration at the time when they ought to have been delivered.

In my judgment, that being so, this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

This judgment governs Appeal No. 1124 which is also dismissed with costs.

During the pendency of a litigation concerning certain properties between A and B, A mortgaged a portion of them to C. The litigation was then compromised and under the compromise decree half of the properties mortgaged to C was given to A and the other half to B, and it was further provided that B should discharge the whole of the mortgage-debt due to C. In a suit by the representatives of C to enforce the mortgage against the mortgaged properties in the hands of the representatives of A and B:

The rule of lis pendens is enacted for the benefit of the 'other party' to the litigation and not for the benefit of the party making the transfer. [p. 261, col. 1.]

Though a transferee pendente lite is a representative of the transferor and bound by the decree so far as it goes against his transferor he cannot for all purposes be treated as if he were a party to the suit. [p. 257, cols. 1 & 2; p. 258, col. 2.]

Per Lindsay, J.—A transferee pendente lite is bound by the decree just as much as if he were a party to the suit and, if he is bound by the decree, he must be bound by the whole decree and is not at liberty to take advantage of one part of the decree and repudiate another part. [p. 259, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a plaintiffs' appeal arising out of a suit for sale on the basis of mortgage-deed dated the 3rd August, 1911, executed by Tori and Duli in favour of Sheikh Wahid-ud-din for Rs. 1,000 at 2 per cent. per mensem compound interest. The property mortgaged consisted of 8 biswas out of 18 biswas 10 biswansis zemin-dari share in village Urena. The present plaintiffs claimed to be the transferees of the mortgagee rights under a sale-deed dated 12th May, 1913.

It appears that in 1908 Tori and Duli had brought a suit for possession as reversioners against Damodar Das, defendant No. 2, who was in possession of the estate, alleging himself to be the adopted son of the deceased male owner. The suit was decreed by the Court of first instance and Damodar Das appealed to the High Court. While the appeal was pending, Tori and Duli executed the mortgage-deed of the 3rd August, 1911, which is in dispute in the present case. Subsequently on the 17th March, 1913, Tori and Duli on the one hand, and Damodar Das on the other, compromised their claims. It was agreed between them that Tori and Duli would take half the share in the property and that Damodar Das would take the other half. It was also provided that Damodar Das should discharge the debt due to Wahid-ud-din and that neither Tori nor Duli nor their property should be liable therefor. Wahid-ud-din, the mortgagee, was no party to this compromise. A decree was framed in terms of the said compromise. It was after this decree that Wahid-ud-din executed the sale-deed of the 12th May, 1913, in favour of the present plaintiffs, for a sum of Rs. 1,471.

One common plea raised by all the defendants is that it was Damodar Das himself who took this sale-deed in 1913 benami in the name of the present plaintiffs, in order to defeat his creditors and transferees. It was pleaded that by this arrangement Damodar Das has really discharged the mortgage of 1911 which under the compromise decree he was bound to pay up.

The representatives of Tori and Duli pleaded that the mortgage being pendente lite, Wahid-ud-din and his representatives were bound by the compromise decree, and that inasmuch as that decree provided that the share of Tori and Duli would not be liable for the mortgage debt, the suit against them should be dismissed.

Damodar Das did not put in any written statement, but the position taken up by his representatives was that the plaintiffs not being a party to the decree, could not take advantage of it, nor could they ignore one part of the decree and try to enforce the other part. The learned Subordinate Judge has on the question of fact come to the conclusion that the purchase of 1913 was made by Damodar Das himself and the mortgage-debt has been discharged. On the question of law he was inclined to the view that "so far as the moiety of Tori and Duli is concerned, it is not absolved from liability, and so far as the other moiety is concerned, it is equally unaffected by the compromise".

The plaintiffs have appealed from the decree and urge that the whole claim should be decreed against the entire share.

[His Lordship then considered the question of fact whether the purchase of 1913 was a benami transaction and after discussing the evidence disagreed with the finding of the Court below, and proceeded :—]

The next question that requires consideration is whether both or either of the moiety shares is liable to be sold. Mr. Bajpai on behalf of Ram Sarup, a transferee from Sohan Lal, son of Duli and a representative of Tori and Duli, has strongly urged that the plaintiffs being representatives of Wahid-ud-din, who was pendente lite transferee, are bound by the compromise decree and by all its terms. His contention is that a transfer pendente lite is subject to the terms of the decree that is eventually passed and further that a transferee pendente lite is really a representative of one of the parties, and as such is bound by the decree. He, therefore, contends that as a result of the compromise decree, the half share which was occupied by Tori and Duli should be exempt from all liability, and as directed by the decree the entire debt should fall on the half share of Damodar Das in the hands of his representatives. Strong reliance has been placed by him on the case of Sheo Narain v. Chunni Lal (1), and the case of Gulzari Lal v. Madho Ram (2), and on the remarks contained in those judgments that a pendente lite transferee is bound by the decree and is a representative of a party.

It seems to me that those remarks should be understood in the light of the facts of those cases. The expression "subject to the decree" or "bound by the decree" are certainly true in one sense. It would, however, not be fair to substitute these expressions in place of the words actually used in s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act, in order to give it a meaning. What that section provides is that the property cannot be transferred or otherwise dealt with by any party to the suit or proceeding, so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein. What we have, therefore, to see is not whether the enforcement of the mortgage would in any way affect the rights of the mortgagors, Tori and Duli, but whether its enforcement would affect the rights of Damodar Das. As observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Faiyaz Husain Khan

(1) 22 A. 243; A. W. N. (1900) 51; 9 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 1193.

v. Prag Narain (3), the correct mode of stating the doctrine of lis pendens, which s. 52 is concerned, is, as was observed by Cranworth, L. J. in an earlier case* "pendente lite neither party to the litigation can alienate the property in dispute, so as to affect his opponent". The transferor himself cannot complain that his rights are affected by the transfer. A grantor cannot derogate from his own grant. Section 52 is, in my opinion, not intended for the protection of transferors in a pending litigation. So far as they themselves are concerned, they are bound by their own transfers. The other parties thereto require to be protected otherwise, in the words of Turner, L. J., quoted by their Lordships, "it would plainly be impossible that any action or suit could be brought to a successful termination if alienations pendente lite were permitted to prevail". Now Damodar Das was the party other than the transferors, Tori and Duli. It has to be seen whether the rights of Damodar Das will be affected if the mortgage is enforced against the half share of Tori and Duli. It seems to me that even if Damodar Das and his representatives be temporarily relieved of their liability by the enforcement of the mortgage against the share of Tori and Duli, their rights are in no way injuriously affected thereby. I do not think that a temporary relief of his liability is tantamount to affecting the rights of Damodar Das. If any part of the mortgaged property is retained by the mortgagors under the decree, I see no good ground for holding that such property is absolved from its liability.

The argument that the pendente lite mortgagee is a representative of his mortgagors and is bound by the decree, cannot be pushed to an extreme limit. The cases relied upon by Mr. Bajpai were cases where the purchaser of the property in dispute was allowed to raise objections in the execution department as a representative of all the judgment-debtors. That is quite a different matter. In such cases the property has devolved on the transferee and he is certainly a representative of the judgment-debtor qua that property. It is also undoubtedly true that a pendente lite transferee is bound by the decree so far as it goes against his transferor, but it is:

be a different thing to say that such a transferee should be treated for all purposes as if he were a party to the suit. Let us take an extreme case by way of illustration. A property is in dispute in a suit between A and B. While the suit is pending, A mortgages the property to C. Having transferred it, A enters into a compromise with B and on paying him some cash consideration, retains the entire property but throws the liability to pay the mortgage debt on B. The compromise specifically states that the property in the hands of A will be free from the liability of the mortgage and that B will be personally liable to pay the debt to C. Can, in such a case, A insist on C suing B on his personal liability? Can such a compromise put an end to the charge which had been created in favour of C? A transfer pendente lite is not absolutely void but is only voidable at the instance of the other party thereto whose rights are affected thereby. In my view, in such a case, the charge will remain alive. On the same principle I am of opinion that the mortgagees are entitled to enforce the charge against the half share retained by Tori and Duli which has now devolved on their representatives. It would be no consolation to the mortgagees to suggest that they may have a remedy against Damodar Das. That remedy, as will be shown hereafter, is not open to them, and in any case, even if it were open, the mortgaged property would be reduced to half, if the compromise decree means that a charge was to be created on the half share of Damodar Das.

As regards the moiety share of Damodar Das, I am, in the first place, very doubtful whether the plaintiffs, when their predecessor Wahid-ud-din was no party to the compromise decree, can enforce it against Damodar Das' representatives. No doubt in equity Damodar Das and his representatives are bound to pay the amount, but if a breach is committed by them, the representatives of Tori and Duli are entitled to damages. The plaintiffs cannot be deemed to be a party to the compromise so as to be in a position to take advantage of it against the Will of Damodar Das and his representatives. In the second place, I feel another difficulty in giving the plaintiffs a decree against this half share also. No doubt, the compromise itself provided that Damodar Das would be liable for the amount and it may, therefore, be stated that Damodar Das' rights under the decree would not be affected by the enforcement of the mortgage against him. It, however, seems to me that the plaintiffs are entitled to enforce their mortgage against the half share of Tori and Duli on the only ground that they are not bound by the decree so far as that interest is concerned. It is by ignoring the provisions of the decree that they can succeed against Tori and Duli. At one and the same time they cannot be allowed to take advantage of the very decree which they ignore in that way, and to enforce that decree against the representatives of Damodar Das. It would be approving and reprobating the compromise simultaneously, which cannot be tolerated. I, therefore, think that the plaintiffs' only remedy is against the representatives of the transferors of their predecessor, and they cannot be allowed to proceed against Damodar Das' representatives.

I would, therefore, decree the claim for the entire amount due on the mortgage against the half share of Tori and Duli which is now in the possession of Ram Sarup, defendant No. 3, and would dismiss the claim in toto against Damodar Das and his representatives.

Lindsay, J.—The facts are all set out in the judgment of my learned brother and I agree with him in finding that the Court below was wrong in holding that the assignment of the mortgage in suit was a benami transaction.

There remains the question of law, namely, the application of the doctrine of lis pendens to the facts of the case.

It is not disputed that the mortgage now in suit was executed pendente lite by Tori and Duli, on the 3rd August, 1911. The litigation in which Tori and Duli were arrayed against Damodar Das was terminated by a decree of this Court passed in terms of a compromise on the 17th March, 1913 (see the decree in First Appeal No. 168 of 1911).

By the mortgage of the 3rd August, 1911 an 8-biswa share of Mauza Urena was hypothecated and this share was one of the items directly and specifically in suit in the litigation concluded by the High Court decree above-mentioned. That decree declared that a moiety of this 8-biswas share was awarded to the appellant Damodar Das and was to remain in his possession. It was also declared that Damodar Das was to discharge the debts incurred in favour of Shafi-ud-din (sic) and Jammu of Sangrampur and that neither the plaintiffs (Tori and Duli) nor their property were to be liable therefor. The name Shafi-ud-din in this decree is a mistake for Wahid-ud-din. The other half of this share and several other items of property were by the decree awarded to the respondents, Tori and Duli, subject to their discharging a debt owing to Mathura Prasad of Pilibhit. It was declared that neither Damodar Das nor his property were to be liable for this latter debt.

It cannot, I think, be seriously argued that if Wahid-ud-din the mortgagee had been a party to this litigation he would have been bound by the decree and could only enforce his mortgage against the moiety of the 8 biswas awarded by the decree to Damodar Das. He was not, however, a party. On the other hand he was a transferee pendente lite and there is, I think, ample authority for the proposition that such a transferee is as much bound by the decrees passed in the lis as if he had been an actual party to it.

My learned brother has quoted one of the observations made by Lord Cranworth in the well-known case of Bellamy v. Sabine (4). I should like to supplement this by a further quotation from the same judgment. It is as follows:—

"Where a litigation is pending between a plaintiff and a defendant as to the right to a particular estate, the necessities of mankind require that the decision of the Court in the suit shall be binding, not only on the litigant parties, but also on those who derive title under them by alienations made pending the suit, whether such alienees had or had not notice of the pending proceedings. If this were not so, there could be no certainty that the litigation would ever come to an end."

It is in the sense indicated in this passage that I interpret the judgments of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Radha-madhab Haldar v. Monohar Mukerji (5) and Moti Lal v. Karrah-ul-din (6).

In the Full Bench decision of this Court, Gulzari Lal v. Madho Ram (2) the former

(4) (1857) 1 De G. & J. 566; 26 L. J. Ch. 797; 3 Jur. (N. S.) 943; 6 W. R. 1; 44 E. R. 842; 118 R. R. 228.

of these two judgments was cited by Banerji, J., who at page 463* of the report expressed himself as follows:—

"In Radhamadhub Holdar v. Monohar Mukerji (5) their Lordships of the Privy Council held that a person who had, during the pendency of a mortgagee's suit for sale, purchased the mortgaged property in execution of a simple decree for money was bound by the proceedings and the decree in the suit".

A still earlier decision of this Court, Hukm Singh v. Zanki Lal (7) laid down that a purchaser pendente lite being bound by the decree against the persons through whom he claimed could not be permitted to go behind the decree so as to show that there was an error patent on the face of the decree.

With these authorities behind me I take the view that a transferee pendente lite is bound by the decree just as much as if he were a party to the suit and, if he is bound by the decree, he must be bound by the whole decree and is not at liberty to take advantage of one part of the decree and repudiate another part. The principle appears to be that a person who takes a transfer from any of the parties to a pending litigation thereby puts himself in privity with the suit, and must be treated, not as a stranger to the suit, but as a party to it and consequently bound by the terms of the decree in full.

It is true that in the case now being considered the final decree which was passed by this Court was founded upon a compromise. But that fact does not interfere with the application of the doctrine of lis pendens. A decree based upon a compromise is just as much binding as a decree founded upon a decision upon the merits. I may refer in this connection to the Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court, Annamalai Chettiar v. Malayandi Appaya Naik (8). And I also note that this matter was not contested before us.

Applying the above principles to the case before me I am of opinion that the plaintiffs in this mortgage suit can enforce their mortgage only against that moiety of the property which the High Court's decree awarded to Damodar Das. Neither the latter nor his representatives who are impleaded as defendants can complain that the enforcement of the mortgage against the property in their hands "affects" the rights of Damodar Das under the High Court's decree. On the contrary the mortgage would, in this way, be enforced in strict accordance with the terms of that decree.

On the other hand, that decree by its terms has relieved the moiety share awarded to Tori and Duli of all liability for the discharge of the mortgage-debt now sought to be enforced; it has also absolved Tori and Duli from all personal liability for this debt, and the declarations to this effect are an integral part of the High Court's decree which, for the reasons given above, is binding upon the transferee pendente lite to the full extent of its terms.

I cannot accept the argument that Tori and Duli or their representatives are debarred from availing themselves of these declarations on the ground that by doing so they are seeking to derogate from their own grant. They are, in my opinion, entitled to say that under the decree both they and their property stand free of all liability for this claim; and a mortgagee who takes a precarious transfer from one of the parties to a pending suit, and who knew, or must be taken to have known, that his transfer was subject to the result of the litigation then pending ought not to be heard to say that his transferor is seeking to derogate from his own grant because the decree which concludes the litigation has deprived the transferor of a portion of the property to which he could still make title at the date of the mortgage.

For these reasons I hold that the appeal should be allowed in part and that the plaintiff should be given a decree for sale against Damodar Das and his representatives in respect of the moiety share of the mortgaged property in their possession. I would dismiss the suit as against the representatives of Tori and Duli with costs.

By the Court.—The members of this Bench have differed on the question whether under the circumstances set forth above, the plaintiffs are entitled to enforce their mortgage against the half share of Tori and Duli, or the half share of Damodar Das, or both, or neither. Accordingly, under s. 98 of the Civil Procedure Code we refer the question as to what reliefs the plaintiffs are entitled to in this case, to one or more of the other Judges of this Court, whom the Hon'ble the Chief Justice may select,

The point of law was referred to Mukerji, J., and his Lordship decided as follows:—

Mukerji, J.—This first appeal was before two learned Judges of this Court for disposal. They differed on a point of law and that question alone has been referred for my opinion.

The facts involved, so far as I am concerned, are these. Two persons, Tori and Duli, claimed certain properties as belonging to one Than Chand against one Damodar Das and others. Damodar Das was the principal claimant of the property on the other side. The suit was instituted in 1908 and was decided in the then plaintiffs' favour on the 21st of February, 1911. After this decree was passed in their favour Tori and Duli mortgaged an 8-biswas share in the village Urena to one Wahid-ud-din, the predecessor-in-title of the present plaintiffs. A first appeal was filed by Damodar Das in this Court and it was settled by a compromise arrived at on the 7th of March, 1913. It was agreed as between Tori and Duli on one side and Damodar Das on the other that certain properties including a half share in the 8 biswas of Urena should go to Tori and Duli and they should discharge a certain debt due to one Mathura Prasad. Certain other properties including the other half share in the 8 biswas of Urena were given to Damodar Das and he agreed to discharge among other debts, the debt due to Wahid-ud-din (the name of Wahid-ud-din appears to have been wrongly given as Shafi-ud-din in the compromise). It was further agreed that, so far as the debts undertaken to be paid by Damodar Das were concerned, neither Tori nor Duli nor their properties were to be liable.

The plaintiffs have brought the suit, out of which this appeal has arisen, to recover Rs. 11,000 and odd by sale of the entire 8-biswas share mortgaged to Wahid-ud-din on the 3rd of August, 1911. The entire 8 biswas share has passed out of the hands of Tori and Duli and Damodar Das. Tori and Duli's share (4 biswas) is now owned by the defendant second party Ram Sarup and the share of Damodar Das is now owned by the defendants 3rd party. There are certain subsequent mortgagees as well as pro forma defendants in the suit. The question on which the learned Judges differed was whether 4-biswas given by the compromise decree to Tori and Duli was liable in the hands of the present owners and transferees or whether the 4-biswas given by the compromise decree to Damodar Das was liable. The learned Judges appear to have been agreed that the entire 8 biswas could not be sold.

Before me, Mr. Malik contended that the entire 8 biswas could be sold at the instance of the plaintiffs. There is no force in this contention, for reasons to be presently stated in deciding the point referred to me for opinion.

To start with, no party who has made a transfer to another is entitled to say that the transferee has no right to the property. This is elementary law. This principle has been stretched so far as to enact a rule of law that where a person, without owning a property, purports to transfer it, he would be bound to make good the transfer, if, later he acquires that property; vide s. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act. It seems to me, therefore, consistent with principles that Tori and Duli, who made the mortgage, should make it good by means of any property that may be in their hands out of the property mortgaged by them. Now, is there any principle or rule of law which enables Tori and Duli or their representatives to say that by reason of certain things that have since happened they are not liable to make good their promise as contained in the deed of mortgage? The law on the point under consideration has been embodied in s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act, which, for the purposes of the Indian Courts, contains the entire law on the subject of lis pendens. If s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act should enable Tori and Duli to say that they are entitled to plead that section as a bar to the enforcement of the mortgage against any property in their hands, they will succeed, otherwise not.

Looking to s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act it runs as follows (omitting unimportant portions):—

"During the active prosecution..... of a contentious suit..... in which any right to immoveable property is directly and specifically in question, the property cannot be transferred..... by any party to the suit..... so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein....." This rule lays down that when a piece of immoveable property is in contest between two parties, one of the parties cannot transfer it so as to prejudice the other party if the result of the litigation is in favour of the other party. It will be noticed that the rule is enacted entirely for the benefit of the "other party" and not for the benefit of the party making the transfer. The reason seems to be clear. The party who makes the transfer is bound by it while the question is whether the successful party in the litigation, who is not the party making the transfer, is also to be bound by the transfer. The rule is that the "other party" is not to be so bound. There is, therefore, nothing in s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act which would enable Tori and Duli to say to Wahid-ud-din, "We are not going to keep our contract and make good our word on account of the provisions of s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act."

In various cases a transferee pendente lite has been described as the representative of his transferor so far as the result of the suit is concerned. This description would be perfectly good as between the transferee and the party other than the transferor. As between the transferee and the party who is not the transferor, the transferee pendente lite cannot claim a higher right than his transferor. In this sense, no doubt, the transferee is a representative of the transferor. But I have not come across any case in which a question as to rights may have arisen, as between the transferor and the transferee and it has been said that the transferee is a representative of the transferor. As between these two, there is no question of representation. They are parties to a contract, they are bound by the terms. In my opinion we have to look for the whole law on the subject to the provisions of s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act alone and not elsewhere.

It will be noticed from the statement of facts made above, that Damodar Das made only a personal covenant to pay the debt due to Wahid-ud-din. He did not even say that Wahid-ud-din's debt was a mortgage debt. (I sent for the record of First Appeal No. 168 of 1911 and examined the compromise in the case). The promise on the part of Tori and Duli to Mathura Prasad's debt was purely a personal promise and so was the promise on the part of Damodar Das. Nowhere in the compromise was any property ear-marked as being liable for the debts of Mathura Prasad or Wahid-ud-din or Jammu. It follows, therefore, that under the compromise decree Damodar Das got an absolute title to a 4-biswas share out of 8-biswas of Urena mortgaged to Wahid-ud-din. Wahid-ud-din being a transferee pendente lite could not touch the property which Damodar Das, being the "other party" to the litigation got under the terms of the decree. This is the reason why the 4-biswas in the hands of defendants 3rd party cannot be touched. Further, the undertaking on the part of Damodar Das to pay the debt of Wahid-ud-din was an undertaking which could not be enforced at the instance of Wahid-ud-din who was not a party to the contract or to the decree. He obtained a mortgage of 8-biswas and he could always insist on the terms of his contract being made good by his mortgagors or their representatives, so far as it lay in their power to do so.

My opinion, therefore, is that the mortgage in suit is enforceable against only those 4-biswas of Urena which are now held by the representatives of Tori and Duli and the mortgage is not enforceable against the 4-biswas share given to Damodar Das under the compromise decree.

Although an action for damages against one or some of several joint wrong-doers is maintainable, in an action in ejectment all persons in possession should be impleaded as defendants, and there is no distinction in principle, for the purpose of this rule, between the cases of trespassers and of tenants. [p. 263, col. 2.]

[Case-law considered.]

The principles governing the rule of joinder of defendants in an action for ejectment are mainly two; first, if any of the persons in possession is left out, he remains in possession as not being affected by the decree, and the decree as one in ejectment and for possession becomes infructuous because the persons ejected as being bound by the decree can always come in under the person who remains in possession; and second, there is a certain amount of risk involved in not making the persons in actual possession defendants, for in execution of the decree persons may happen to be turned out who may then bring actions against the plaintiff for wrongful dispossession, not being bound by the decree. JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiffs to recover khass possession of certain lands on declaration of the plaintiffs' maliki right thereto. The plaintiffs' case was that one Rahamat Sheikh held an ordinary jote, that he abandoned the same and went away from the village without making any arrangements for payments of rent of the jote and that the plaintiffs wanted to take possession of the lands but were resisted by the defendants. Of the defendants against whom the suit was instituted only one, viz., the defendant No. 5 filed a written statement and contested the suit. The substantial defence of the defendant No. 5 was that Sheikh Rahamat's sons sold a portion of the lands to the defendant No. 5 and his brothers (one of whom was the defendant No. 6) in 1316, that since the said sale the defendant No. 5 and his brothers have been in possession of the lands which they had purchased, and the heirs of Sheikh Rahamat were in possession of the remaining lands of the jote. The defence thus put forward was that there was no abandonment but only a transfer of a part of the holding.

The trial Court found that there was a complete abandonment of the holding and decreed the suit except as against the defendant No. 6 who died during the pendency of the suit. He found that the defendant No. 6 had left a mother who was alive, and though the latter was not brought on the record as the heir of the defendant No. 6 the suit would not fail. The defendant No. 5 appealed from this decision. The Subordinate Judge framed three questions for determination: 1st. Is the suit maintainable against the other defendants without making the legal representatives of the deceased defendant No. 6 parties to the suit; 2nd. Was there any abandonment of the holding held by Rahamat and his successors; and 3rd. Are plaintiffs entitled to khass possession. He did not determine the 2nd and the 3rd questions as his answer to the 1st question was in the negative. The suit was, therefore, dismissed. The plaintiffs have then appealed to this Court.

The suit as framed in the plaint was against the heirs of Rahamat Sheikh who were the defendants Nos. 1 to 3, the purchasers who were the defendants Nos. 4 to 6, and the sub-tenants the defendants Nos. 7 and 8. It was, as has been already stated, a suit for khass possession.

The maintainability of the suit in the absence of the heirs of the defendant No. 6 has been sought to be justified on the footing of the liability of joint wrong-doers, it being urged that it is a joint and several liability. In actions for damages joint wrong-doers may be sued jointly or severally. The principles relating to these actions are well-settled. In Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th Edition, page 206 they are stated thus: "Where more than one person is concerned in the commission of a wrong, the person wronged has his remedy against all or any one or more of them at his choice. Every wrong-doer is liable for the whole damage, and it does not matter whether they acted, as between themselves, as equals, or one of them as agent or servant of another. There are no degrees of responsibility, nothing answering to the distinction in criminal law between principals and accessories. But when the plaintiff in such a case has made his choice, he is concluded by it. After recovering judgment against some or one of the joint authors of a wrong, he cannot sue the other or the others for the same matter, even if the judgment in the first action remains unsatisfied. By that judgment the cause of action 'transit in rem judicatum', and is no longer available. The reason of the rule is stated to be that otherwise a vexatious multiplicity of actions would be encouraged." As regards joint torts it is said in Addison's Law of Torts, 8th Edition, page 44: "All who aid or counsel, direct or join in, the commission of a tort are joint tort-feasors. 'If divers do a trespass it is joint and several at the will of him to whom the wrong is done', that is to say, he can sue any one or more of them at his election, and those who are sued cannot insist on having the others joined as defendants." In Thurman v. Wild (1) and other cases it was settled that an accord and satisfaction by one wrong-doer for the whole injury done discharges all the wrong-doers. A release, therefore, given of the whole cause of action to one discharges the others the reason being that the cause of action being one and indivisible some having been released all persons otherwise liable thereto are consequently released: Cocke v. Jennor (2). But a covenant or agreement not to sue one of them is no defence to an action against the others: Hutton v. Eyre (3). If, therefore, while purporting to release one tort-feasor it reserves rights against another, it will be construed as a covenant not to sue, and not a release: Duck v. Mayen (4), Rice v. Reed (5). The rule for construing such a document was laid down in the case of Price v. Barker (6) where it was held that in determining whether a document be a release or a covenant not to sue the intention of the parties was to be carried out, and if it were clear that the right against a joint debtor was intended to be preserved inasmuch as such a right would not be preserved if the document were held to be a release, the proper construction where this was sought to be done was that it was a covenant not to sue, and not a release. In King v. Hoare (7) Parke B authoritatively laid down—"These considerations lead us, quite satisfactorily to our own minds, to the conclusion, that where judgment has been obtained for a debt, as well as a tort, the right given by the record merges the inferior remedy by action for the same debt or tort against another party." See also Buckland v. Johnson (8), Brinsmead v. Harrison (9) and Kendall v. Hamilton (10). Brinsmead v. Harrison (9) settled the point: that after recovering judgment against one wrong-doer, a plaintiff cannot sue the other for the same matter, even if the first action remains unsatisfied a proposition which was doubted before them. Though s. 43 of the Indian Contract Act is not perhaps quite clear whether a complete adaptation of the English rule is intended, yet King v. Hoare (7) has been held to apply in this country both in respect of joint debtors and of joint wrong-doers. A fortiori then, an action for damages against one or some of several joint wrong-doers is maintainable.

Such an action, however, is entirely distinct from an action in ejectment. At common law there were only two kinds of redress from actionable wrong. One was to take the law into one's own hands of which it has been said thus: "It is only when the party's lawful act restores to him something which he ought to have, or puts an end to a state of things whereby he is wronged, or at least puts pressure on the wrong-doer to do him right, that self-help is a true remedy... The acts of this nature which we meet with in the law of torts are expulsion of a trespasser, re-taking of goods by the rightful possessor, distress damage feasant, and abatement of nuisances. Peaceable re-entry upon land where there has been a wrongful change of possession is possible, but hardly occurs in modern experience." (Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th Edition, page 189). Possession could be recovered from an early time, but in an action which was one of trespass in form only and in reality was a sort of a real action. Before the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76) actions of ejectment were in point of form pure fictions and of these actions it is thus said in Cole on Ejectment, page 2: "The whole proceeding was an ingenious fiction, dexterously contrived so as to raise in every case the only real question, viz., the claimant's title or right of possession, and to exclude every other, and whereby the delay and expense of special pleadings and the danger of variances by an incorrect statement of the claimant's title or estate were avoided. But it was objectionable, on the ground that fictions and unintelligible forms should not be used in Courts of Justice; especially when the necessity for them might be avoided by a simple writ so framed as to raise precisely the same question in a true, concise, and intelligible form. This has been attempted with considerable success in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852." 15 & 16 Vic. c. 76, s. 118, directed that "Instead of the present proceeding by ejectment a writ shall be issued, directed to all the persons in possession by name and to all persons entitled to defend the possession of the property claimed, which property shall be described in the writ with reasonable certainty. The Act of 1852 practically retained the old form of action, divested of the fictions on which it depended. As regards the parties to be made defendants in an action of ejectment the following is what is said in Dicey's Parties to an Action, pages 494 and 497: "The persons to be made defendants in an action of ejectment, i. e., to be named in the writ, are all the tenants in possession of the land, etc., sought to be recovered..... The persons to be named in the writ are, therefore, all the tenants in possession, i. e., every person who occupies as tenant or under-tenant (or as owner), any part of the property..... All the persons in actual occupation of the land claimed, must, as already pointed out, be named in the writ and made defendants." In Cole on Ejectment, page 75, it is said: "The general rule on this subject is, that the action should be brought against all the tenants in possession, i. e., every person who occupies, as a tenant or under-tenant, any part of the property: Doe v. Roe (11). Doe v. Roe (12), Doe v. Cock (13) and Doe v. Gee (14)." In every case, however, regard must be had to the circumstances. e. g., where the real intention of the action is to turn out the tenant and not the sub-tenants and the sub-tenants are numerous the latter need not be joined: Geen v. Herring (15). If a person in possession but not claiming through the defendant is not sued but ejected he may have the judgment set aside on being added as a party: Minet v. Johnson (16).

The cause of action in an action for damages is the injury sustained, while in that of action for ejectment is the detention of the property. The two causes of action are essentially distinct, and the principles applicable are radically different.

In Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 23, page 102 the principles are summarized thus: Paragraph 179,—"The proper defendant in an action of tort is the wrong-doer, or the person who is liable for the acts of the wrong doer, or to whom the liability for the injury has passed. If several persons jointly commit a tort, they may all be sued jointly for such tort, or any one or more of them may be sued separately, and if one of several wrong-doers is thus sued the plaintiff cannot be obliged to join any of the others as co-defendant." Paragraph 180.—"In an action brought for the recovery of land, all the persons who are in possession should in general be joined as defendants."

The principles governing the rule of joinder of defendants in an action for ejectment are mainly two; first, if any of the persons in possession is left out, he remains in possession as not being affected by the decree, and the decree as one in ejectment and for possession becomes infructuous because the persons ejected as being bound by the decree can always come in under the person who remains in possession; and second, there is a certain amount of risk involved in not making the persons in actual possession defendants for in execution of the decree persons may happen to be turned out who may then bring actions against the plaintiff for wrongful dispossession, not being bound by the decree.

It may, however, happen that the existence of a person in possession is not known to the plaintiff and so he is omitted, or one who is not in possession is wrongly impleaded in the action. In cases such as these as observed in Cole on Ejectment, pages 84-85: ".....If the name of any tenant in possession be omitted as a defendant those parts of the premises which are in his occupation cannot be recovered in that action. On the other hand, if the name of any person be inserted as a defendant, who is not actually a tenant in possession of any part of the property claimed, it will probably be necessary to obtain a Judge's order to amend the writ by striking out his name and to amend the writ accordingly." In a case where the plaintiff has alleged in the plaint that a person is in possession, and there is no question of any particular share of which he may be in possession, it is obvious that it is not possible to apply the principle embodied in the first part of this rule.

For the application of the rule that in an action in ejectment all persons in possession should be impleaded as defendants there is no distinction in principle between the cases of trespassers and of tenants who claim to hold under a title, because all actions in ejectment proceed on the assumption that the plaintiff has title and hence the right to possession and that the defendant has none. The rule that all persons in actual possession should be joined as parties has been recognized in this country, upon good authority: Banubi v. Narsingrao (17), Kali Narayan Roy v. Haran Chandra Ghose (18), Sarat Kamini Dasi v. Chaitanya Chandra Prohoraj (19), Siddik Ahmed Kerani v. Azizar Rahaman Khan (20). The principle that a suit will not be entertained where no effective decree can be passed in it is well recognized: Haran Sheikh v. Ramesh Chandra Bhattacharjee (21).

The result then is that the appellant's contention that the suit was maintainable in the absence of the heirs of the defendant No. 6 must fail. There has, however, been no investigation on the question as to whether the mother of defendant No. 6 is in possession and if so whether she is not in possession of any specific plot out of the land in suit. In view of the exceptional nature of the case in which the said defendant has left only a mother surviving him we think the plaintiff should be given an opportunity of establishing that the said widow may very well be left out, on an investigation held on the lines indicated in the judgment of this Court in Sarat Kamini Dasi v. Chaitanya Chandra Prohoraj (19).

We accordingly set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and send back the case to that Court so that the plaintiff may be given such an opportunity and that on giving the defendants also a chance of producing any materials in rebuttal that they may desire to dispose of the appeal in accordance with law.

The appeal is thus allowed and the case remanded to the lower Appellate Court. Costs of this appeal will abide the result.

JUDGMENT.

Marten, C. J.—In this second appeal the questions for our consideration are whether a notice of the meeting was "circulated" to the members within the meaning of s. 35 (2) (b) of the Bombay Local Boards Act, 1923, and whether the meeting was validly convened. Secondly, if so, whether the retiring President had power to dissolve the meeting, and, thirdly, whether the fact that seven members left after he had pronounced the meeting dissolved affected the subsequent proceedings in which a new Chairman was elected, and then a President for the ensuing three years elected.

Now, we are bound in second appeal by the facts as found by the lower Appellate Court, and those facts are that a notice convening the meeting was sent by post to all the members of the Board: and that it was received by all except the one member in question, viz., Mr. Majli, but it was delivered at the latter's house, though, in fact, he did not receive it. On this I would only say that the learned Judge has not expressly directed his attention to s. 114 of the Indian Evidence Act, illus. (f), whereunder a presumption would arise that the common course of business was followed in this particular case, and that as the letter was delivered at Mr. Majli's house, he would, in the ordinary course, have received it. But it is unnecessary to pursue that point. We will accept the learned Judge's view that, although the letter was delivered at his house, he in fact never received it.

I, accordingly, turn to the construction of the material sections of the Act, to which I will shortly refer. Section 27 provides that a meeting for the election of a new President shall be called by the President of the retiring Board. The President of the retiring Board shall preside at such meeting and the new Board shall then elect its own Chairman for that meeting, and then the meeting shall proceed to elect the new President. Next, s. 35 (2) (b) provides that twenty-one clear days' notice of a quarterly meeting and fourteen clear days' notice of a special meeting, specifying certain matters shall be "circulated" to the members and posted up at the Local Board Office. Such notice shall include, in the case of a special meeting, any motion or proposition mentioned in any written request made for such meeting. Then (c) provides for a quorum and for an adjournment by the President in the absence of a quorum; (f) that all questions are to be decided by a majority of votes of the members present; (h) that any quarterly meeting may, with the consent of a majority of the members present, be adjourned from time to time; and (4) that "no act of a Board, or of any person acting as a member or as a President, Vice-President, or Chairman, shall be deemed to be invalid by reason only of some defect in the appointment of such Board, President, Vice-President, Chairman, or member, or on the ground that they, or any of them, were disqualified for the office of member, or that formal notice of the intention to hold a meeting of the Board was not duly given, or for any other such mere informality". Section 63 provides that "the service of every notice, and the presentation of every bill under this Act, on any person or to any person to whom it is by name addressed shall, in all cases not otherwise specially provided for in this Act, be effected" in the manner therein mentioned.

Our view of the construction of the Act is that s. 63 does not apply here because the service of notice for meetings of the Board is "otherwise specially provided for" in this Act, viz., under s. 35 (2) (b).

Next, turning to that last mentioned section, the view we take of the word "circulated" is that it is sufficient for the Board to circulate notices of a meeting by post, and that it is not essential that a notice should be served personally on every member. Incidentally as the members of this Board live, in many cases, at big distances from each other, it would be essential, according to the contention of the appellant, that a peon should be sent round this large District over many miles in order to serve each member of the Board personally and separately. The legislation might have provided for that, but, in our opinion, it has not done so, and in fact service by post has been hereto the recognised means by which this body has given notice to its members of the meetings. In our view that is in accordance with the true construction of the Act.

We are, therefore, of opinion here that the notice was circulated to, inter alia, this particular member Mr. Majli who is the only member as to whom any question of want of notice arises.

Passing to the next point, the question arises whether the President had power to dissolve the meeting which, in our opinion, was properly convened. It is said that it was his duty to see that the meeting was properly convened, and it, therefore, follows from that, that if, in his opinion, it was not properly convened he had power to dissolve the meeting there and then. One flaw in that argument, in our opinion, is that the President must, at any rate, be right on his facts. Accordingly, if, in fact, the meeting was properly convened, and notices had been properly given, it would not be left to his absolute and final discretion to say whether in law the meeting had been properly convened or not. It is unnecessary for us to say whether he had power to dissolve the meeting, supposing even one notice had not been properly given, because there is sub-s. (4) of s. 35 which, as I have already mentioned, expressly provides for want of a notice being served on an individual member of the Board. There may be other matters to be considered also in that connection, but what I do say is that if, as here, the meeting was properly convened, it does not lie on him to dissolve it forthwith.

Therefore, in my opinion, the second question should also be answered against the appellant, viz., that the President wrongly dissolved the meeting.

Next, turning to the question as to whether the fact that seven members thereupon left the meeting, that again, I think, is partly a question of fact. As I read the learned Judge's judgment, the Chairman never, in fact, left his chair, or at any rate left the meeting until some time after a new Chairman was elected. Consequently, the seven members proceeded to leave this meeting before it had really broken up and before, at any rate, the Chairman had properly left his chair. If, therefore, they chose to do that, I think they could only do so at their own peril, and if in law the Chairman's act was illegal and the remaining members were entitled to proceed with the meeting and elect a new Chairman, then the retiring seven members could not complain in law.

The question seems to me, therefore, to be one entirely different from that in King v. Gaborian (1) where the presiding officer, viz., the mayor, and also two aldermen and several burgesses left the meeting without any objection, and it was not until after that had been done that certain persons who remained in the room purported to make a new election. On the other hand, in National Dwellings Society v. Sykes (2) Mr. Justice Chitty held (page 162*) that it is the duty of a Chairman to preserve order, conduct proceedings regularly, and take care that the sense of the meeting is properly ascertained with regard to any question before it; but he has no power to stop or adjourn a meeting at his own will; and if he purports to do so, it is competent for the meeting to resolve to go on with the business for which it has been convened, and to appoint another Chairman for that object. Counsel for the appellants says that in that case the meeting had begun and that a particular resolution had been passed. Let that be so. To my mind it makes no essential difference whether the Chairman illegally and at once declared the validly called meeting dissolved, or whether he waited till one or two or three resolutions had been passed, and then made an announcement before all the business for which the meeting had been called had been concluded.

I may also refer to Henderson v. Bank of Australasia (3) as illustrating that the decisions of a Chairman are not necessarily final, and that if on any important question he wrongly rules out a particular amendment, then it is open for the Court to revise his decision and to hold if necessary that the resolution passed thereafter was irregular and not binding.

In the view, then, which I take on the facts of this particular case, I think the members had power to continue the meeting notwithstanding the Chairman's erroneous declaration of the dissolution; and I further think that they were entitled to elect their new Chairman, and thereafter to elect their new President for the ensuing three years in accordance with s. 27 of the Act.

I had intended to mention one case that the appellants' Counsel cited to us, viz., Ex parte Dean, In re Dean (4). It was cited for the proposition that the rule requiring a notice to be sent did not amount to delivery of the notice or validate the want of actual notice to the particular parties. But there it was a question of a meeting of creditors who approved of a composition deed under the then bankruptcy rules in England. The Registrar under the rules had a discretion to disregard any resolution which had been passed. The Court held that he exercised that discretion properly in that particular case, because despite an affidavit showing that notices of that meeting had been sent out to the creditors, no less than four of them deposed that in fact they never received the notices. One can quite understand that in a case of approving a composition deed, the fact that no less than four creditors (who may or may not be important ones) did not receive the notices, might very well justify the Registrar in directing that under the circumstances a second meeting should be held.

There was one subsidiary point which was raised by the Bench at the outset of the argument and that was whether this particular suit would lie under s. 9 of the Civil Procedure Code. Speaking for myself, I feel a strong reluctance to interfering with the internal affairs of important legislative or Municipal bodies more than the Court is obliged to do. Thus, as has been pointed out by Mr. Justice Pratt in Parshuram v. Tata Industrial Bank Ltd. (5) there is a general principle as regards, for instance, limited liability Companies that the Court will not interfere with the internal affairs of Companies or Corporations except on certain well-regulated principles generally known as the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (6). But, having regard to the conclusion which we have come to on the merits, it is unnecessary to pursue that point.

Accordingly, in the view I take, I would hold that the learned District Judge arrived at the correct conclusion, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Crump, J.—I agree with the judgment pronounced by the learned Chief Justice, and I only wish to add a few words as regards the argument which was urged upon us that whether the Chairman was right or wrong in declaring the meeting dissolved, still the seven members who left the meeting upon the strength of that ruling (of whom the plaintiffs are two) are entitled to maintain this action because their right of franchise has been affected by what took place during their absence.

It is not very clear from the judgment of the learned District Judge precisely what he intended to find as regards the conduct of these seven persons. But, having regard to para. 61 of his judgment it would appear that he was inclined to believe that the action of these seven persons was premeditated and concerted. At all events he says that a strong inference arises to that effect. He, however, qualifies this in para. 64 of the same judgment, but he does not really depart, as I read his judgment, from the conclusion stated in para. 61. And I take it he must have meant to find that seven persons by some pre-arrangement left the meeting as soon as the retiring President propounded his ruling declaring the meeting dissolved. If that is so, of course, there would be still less reason for considering that these persons could maintain any action on the ground that their rights had suffered.

In other respects, I agree with the conclusion of the learned Chief Justice and the final order proposed.

Second appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Farrukhabad.

Mr. Saila Nath Mukerji, for the Appellants.

Mr. P. L. Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit by a zemindar for possession of a plot of land by ejectment of the tenant in possession on the allegation that it had ceased to be a grove, in that on the whole area of 176 acres there were only left two mangoes. Both Courts have found that on the whole area there were only remaining two mangoes, three self-planted babul and some 8 berri (plum) trees, and holding that the area had lost its character as a grove, have decreed the plaintiff's claim.

I have been pressed with the decision of two learned Judges of this Court upholding in Letters Patent Appeal a judgment of a single Judge, the case of Mahbub Ali Khan v. Chiddan (1). The judgment as reported was difficult to understand and there seemed clearly something wrong. I sent for the original judgment, and all ambiguity vanished when the original judgment showed that there was a clerical error in the report, 5 lines from the bottom of page 600*, where the figures "35 biswas" should be "15 biswas". A correction of the clerical error is vital in view of the remark in the judgment of the Division Bench reported at page 602*, where it is said:—"It is not correct to say that because small portions of the plots have been brought under cultivation, the lands have ceased to retain their character as groves"; and that was clearly the unexpressed basis of the judgment of Mr. Justice Mukerji after he had held that the contract was indivisible. I note also that the putting into italics of the passage at page 601* is also a reporter's error.

It has been held in some cases that the zemindar could eject the tenant from that portion of the grove which had ceased to be used as a grove. The decision of this Court to which I have referred though it does not specifically mention these cases, is based on a principle which involves holding that such decisions are wrong.

In Mahbub Ali Khan v. Chiddan (1) and in the two cases relied upon therein, Jwala Singh v. Saheb Din Singh (2) and Har Sahay v. Dhanpal Singh (3), it was held, firstly, that the contract was indivisible, and secondly, that as the proportion which the land brought under cultivation bore to the land remaining covered with trees was not so great as to justify holding that the land had ceased to retain its character as a grove the whole area must, therefore, be treated as still a grove.

I entirely agree with the proposition that the area given to the tenant as a grove must be treated as a whole; that the whole was the subject of a single contract and that that contract must stand or fall as a whole. I do not find myself, however, in agreement with the view that if the proportion cultivated, or left for a considerable period without re-planting, bears only a small proportion to the whole, the whole must be treated as still a grove and the zemindar's suit dismissed. It appears to me that if in the circumstances of the case Mahbub Ali Khan v. Chiddan (1), the tenant had originally asked the zemindar for a contract that he might use 25 biswas out of the 40 as a grove, and use the other 15 biswas as he pleased, the zemindar would presumably have refused. To hold, then, that the whole must still be treated as a grove appears to me to force upon the zemindar a new contract. In my opinion if the agreement between the zemindar and the tenant was that the tenant should have the specified area for the purposes of a grove, and the tenant either does not use a definite ascertainable portion even a small portion of that area for the purposes of a grove, by neglecting to re-plant for a considerable period, or affirmatively uses a definite ascertainable portion, even a small portion, for some other purpose, e.g., ordinary cultivation, or building a house, he has committed a breach of his contract, and the only question is, what is the remedy of the zemindar. I am not satisfied that it is correct to hold that because the breach of the contract was comparatively a small one, therefore, the zemindar has no remedy at all and in effect will have a new contract forced on him.

If, then, it is correct to hold, in the circumstances of the case, that there has been a breach of the contract, we next have to see what are the zemindar's remedies. The only sections of the Contract Act applicable are ss. 39 and 73. Section 39 reads:—"When a party to a contract has refused to perform, or disabled himself from performing his promise in its entirety, the promisee may put an end to the contract, unless he has signified, by words or conduct, his acquiescence in its continuance". The zemindar is then entitled, if there has been a breach of the contract in regard to a definite ascertainable portion of the area, to put an end to the contract, unless he has acquiesced in the continuance of the contract. In the present case there is no finding as to the exact area in regard to which a breach of the original contract has been committed. But it is unnecessary to remand the case for a finding as to whether there is or is not a definite area, for it is manifest from the paucity of the trees left that a breach of contract has been committed in regard to the great bulk of the area.

The next question is whether the zemindar has acquiesced in the breach. It is his own case that for many years there has been no re-planting, and to that extent he must be held undoubtedly to have acquiesced in what has occurred in the past, and to that extent he must be held to have deprived himself of the right to any damages under s. 73, even if he had asked for them, which he has not. But I do not think that that fact debars him from now saying "I no longer acquiesce" for no equities have arisen upon the basis of which his right could now be held to be barred. This appears to me sufficient for a decision of the case. The tenant has broken his contract and the zemindar is entitled to put an end to that contract. In the case the breach has been committed in regard to the great bulk of the area, but on the principle which I hold to be applicable, the result would be the same if the area in regard to which the breach was committed was comparatively small, provided that it was definitely ascertainable.

Though the principle on which I would decide these cases is not wholly in accordance with the principle on which Mahbub Ali Khan v. Chiddan (1); and other cases have been decided, I do not think that it is necessary for me to refer this case to a Division Bench, for there is no doubt but that their Lordships who decided the case of Mahbub Ali Khan v. Chiddan (1) would have arrived in this case at the result at which I have arrived.

The result is that the plaintiff's suit was, in my opinion, rightly decreed by the Court of first instance. The trial Court gave the plaintiff a decree subject to a reservation of the right of the tenant in the two mango trees remaining. It may be that as a result of the breach of his contract, in the view that I take of it, the defendant tenant would have no right to any such reservation in his favour in regard to the two mango trees, but I have no cross-objection before me and it is unnecessary for me to deal with that.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 34 (2)—Future interest, disallowance of—Duty of Court to state reasons.

A Judge is not relieved of the necessity of giving reasons for disallowing interest pendente lite by s. 34 (2) of the Civil Procedure Code, and in normal cases it is highly desirable that a Judge should give his reasons for disallowing such interest. [p. 271, col. 2.]

The sole object of enacting the section is to prevent a separate suit being brought for future interest when the connected judgment and decree are silent on the point. [p. 271, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the First Sub-Judge, First Class, Nagpur, dated the 30th July, 1926, in Civil Suit No. 61 of 1926.

Mr. B. V. Pradhan, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. N. Padhey, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff-appellant has been granted a decree for Rs. 8,418-10-8.

against the three defendants-respondants as the legal representatives of one Shaikh Kalloo to whom the advances in suit had been given for trade purposes and for building a house. The defendant-respondents have been declared only liable to the extent of the assets of the deceased Shaikh Kalloo in their possession.

In the present appeal I am only concerned with the lower Court's disallowance of interest pendente lite and of future interest from the date of decree to the date of realization. In para. 13 of the plaint, interest at the contract rate of one per cent. per mensem during the pendency of the suit was claimed, as well as future interest at a rate to be fixed by the Court. No specific issue was framed with regard to these two items, and the judgment of the lower Court is absolutely silent as regards them. The plaintiff has, therefore, appealed to this Court for allowance of both these items of interest.

On behalf of the respondents it has been urged that as regards both items, the silence of the lower Court's judgment and decree must be read as inferring that the Subordinate Judge did exercise a discretion in the matter and exercised it in the way of disallowing either kind of interest. There can, however, be no doubt whatever that sub-s. (2) of s. 34, Civil Procedure Code, only has reference to future interest, viz., interest from the date of decree to the date of payment or to such earlier date as the Court thinks fit. Even so, however, sub-s. (2) obviously finds a place in the Statute Book with the one and sole object of preventing a separate suit being brought for future interest when the connected judgment and decree are silent on the point.

The possibilities appear to me to arise as regards the attitude of the lower Court in this matter. It is perfectly possible, Judges being only human, that the Subordinate Judge intently overlooked the question of the allowance or disallowance of interest pendente lite, and future interest. It is equally possible that he did exercise a discretion in the matter but remained silent as to his reasons therefor. In the case of the interest pendente lite, this silence was unjustifiable, although it may be possibly termed justifiable, however inadvisable in the case of future interest. The mere presence of sub-s. (2) of s. 34 on the Statute Book does not necessarily imply an invitation to Judges, when they see reason to disallow future interest, to refrain from stating these reasons, and obviously in the normal case it is highly desirable that the Judge should give his reason for disallowing such future interest. I have been referred to the remarks of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Hiralal Ichhalal v. Desai Narsilal Chaturbhujdas (1) but little help is to be derived from that case in view of the absence of the full judgment of the learned District Judge, to which their Lordships refer. It was possible, of course, for the plaintiff to have applied to the lower Court to repair the omission as to the disallowance of future interest, but it was not incumbent on him to take this course and I am clearly of opinion that he was entitled to come on appeal to this Court, as he has done.

As regards the disallowance of interest pendente lite, there is nothing whatever to show that the Subordinate Judge exercised any discretion whatever in the matter. Prima facie there is no reason whatever why in this case interest pendente lite should not be allowed at such rate as this Court thinks fit and reasonable. The debts in suit were duly incurred for legitimate purposes; the plaintiff appears to have behaved with absolute fairness throughout, and the rate of interest charged was an eminently reasonable one. It is not clear even that there was any undue delay in the filing of the present suit, the decree in which, it will be remembered, only has effect against the property left by the deceased debtor in the hands of the present respondents. Shaikh Kalloo died in June 1924, and the circumstances detailed in paras. 7 and 8 of the plaint would account for a large part of the delay of 14 months which occurred before the present suit was filed: for the comparatively long pendency of this very simple suit various needless and several futile pleas offered on behalf of the second defendant are largely responsible. It has also been suggested that, in view of the receipt (P-10), in which accounts were made up on 15th August, 1922, after a balance had been struck, the interest awarded in reality amounts to compound interest. This is, in essence, so far true, but it cannot be gainsaid that the decision of the lower Court is correct in the interest it has awarded on the documents on record evidencing the debt, and, if the present respondents considered that the decree was wrong in this respect, it was their duty to have filed an appeal. The case, therefore, seems to me one in which the plaintiff is entitled to interest pendente lite, but, on the whole and in view of the amount of interest already included in the sum decreed, I fix the rate of interest pendente lite at 8-annas per cent. per mensem. As regards future interest also, making the most favourable assumption for the respondents, viz., that the Judge of the lower Court did exercise, so to speak, a silent discretion in the matter and disallowed such interest, I am of opinion, for the same reason as I have given with regard to the allowance of interest pendente lite, that the plaintiff is entitled to future interest at the same rate, viz., 8-annas per cent. per mensem. The decree of the lower Court will be modified accordingly by allowing interest at 8-annas per cent. per mensem on the sum already decreed from the date of suit to the date of decree and thereafter future interest will run on the whole amount due at 8-annas per cent. per mensem till realization. The defendants-respondents will bear the plaintiff-appellant's costs in the lower Court as already ordered by that Court, while in this Court the defendants-respondents will bear the plaintiff-appellant's costs in appeal in proportion to his success therein. The remaining costs in this Court will be borne by the party as incurred.

JUDGMENT.

Das, J.—In this suit the plaintiffs claimed that 92 bighas 8 cottas 14 dhurs of land in Mouza Hasanpur Sangama, otherwise called Chaita T. No. 1876, are the bakasht lands of the maliks and are liable to be partitioned as such. The suit was resisted by defendants Nos. 1-5 (the defendants first party) who claimed occupancy right in 103 bighas 19 cottas 17 dhurs of land. The plaintiffs have 11-annas share in the proprietary interest of the mouza, and on the 24th September, 1919, they instituted proceedings under the provisions of the Estates Partition Act for the allotment to them of a takhta comprising their interest in the mouza. The defendants 1st party entered appearance and insisted that their rights as kashtkars should be maintained and preserved in the lands which are now claimed by them as their raiyati lands. On the 29th January, 1922, the Board of Revenue upheld the contention of the defendants and supplied the cause of action to the plaintiff for the present suit. The learned Subordinate Judge has found in favour of the plaintiffs, hence this appeal to this Court by the defendants 1st party.

At all material dates prior to the acquisition of proprietary interest in the mouza by the principal contending parties in this suit, the mouza in question was owned by the following proprietors:—

1. Musammat Jighri Begum 5 annas 6 gandas 2 cowris.
2. Umatul Mehdi and after her Syed Ali Nawab 5 annas 6 gandas 2 cowris.
3. James Wilson 4 annas.
4. Ram Bahadur and others 6 gandas 2 cowris 2 karants.
5. Kunja Lal and others (defendants No. 22-28) 6 gandas 2 cowris 2 karants.
6. Lal Gobind Sahay (defendant No. 29) and Lala Raabati Sahay (defendant No. 30), sons of Narsingh Sahay 6 gandas 2 cowris 2 karants each.

On the 27th November, 1913, defendants Nos. 6—14 (defendants 2nd party) purchased the 4-annas interest of Mr. Wilson. On the 1st April, 1914, the plaintiffs purchased the 5 annas 6 gandas 2 cowris share of Musammat Jighri Begum. On the 11th June, 1919, the plaintiffs purchased the 5 annas 6 gandas 2 cowris interest of Ali Nawab from Sriwar Narain who had purchased the share on the 4th July, 1913. On the 31st October, 1918, the plaintiffs purchased the 6 gandas 2 cowris 2 karants share of Ram Bahadur. It will be noticed that the plaintiffs have purchased the interest of Musammat Jighri Begum, Syed Ali Nawab and Ram Bahadur, whereas the defendants 2nd party have purchased the interest of Mr. Wilson. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that the contest is really between the plaintiffs and the defendants 2nd party, the defendants 1st party being the benamidars of the defendants 2nd party in regard to the raiyyati interest claimed by the former in this litigation. I may mention that 71 bighas 3 cottas 12½ dhurs of the raiyyati lands are nominally in the possession of defendants Nos. 15-21. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that defendants Nos. 15-21 are the benamidars of the plaintiffs. On the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge, therefore, 103 bighas 19 cottas and 17 dhurs of these raiyyati lands are really in the possession of the defendants 2nd party who are the 4-annas proprietors of the mouza and 71 bighas 3 cottas and 12½ dhurs of the raiyyati lands are really in the possession of the plaintiffs who are the 11-annas proprietors of the mouza. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs are interested in destroying the raiyyati character of these lands since if they succeed in their contention, an 11-annas share of these lands must come to them on partition.

The mouza was for many years in the possession of the Rewari Factory as ticcadars. At one time the entire 16-annas, namely, the interest of all the proprietors were the subject of the ticcā in favour of the Rewari Factory but in course of time some of the proprietors determined their leases in favour of the factory. The last of the leases in favour of the factory expired at the end of the fasti year 1319 corresponding with the 26th September 1912. The factory, however, retained possession of 175 bighas 3 cottas and 9¾ dhurs of land claiming occupancy rights therein which they proceeded to sell to different persons by different documents. On the 25th April, 1914, they sold 29 bighas 15 cottas 12 dhurs to Ramanugrah Thakur father of defendants Nos. 1 and 2. On the 8th August, 1914, they sold another block of 37 bighas 12 cottas 13 dhurs to Ramanugrah Thakur. On the same day sold 36 bighas 11 cottas 12 dhurs to Ramnandan Pandey defendant No. 3 the father of defendants Nos. 4 and 5. It will be noticed that by these transactions 103 bighas 19 cottas and 17 dhurs passed by the defendants 1st party. As I have said, the learned Subordinate Judge has found that the defendants 1st party are the benamidars of the defendants 2nd party. On the 5th June, 1915, they executed three conveyances one in favour of defendants Nos. 15-17 in respect of 39 bighas 18 cottas 4¼ dhurs, one in favour of defendants Nos. 18-20 in respect of 23 bighas 8 cottas 9 dhurs and one in favour of defendant No. 21 in respect of 7 bighas 16 cottas 19 dhurs. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that in respect of the transactions of the 5th June, 1915, the defendants Nos. 15-21 were acting as the benamidars of the plaintiffs.

In the Record of Rights which was finally published in 1897, 108 bighas 17 cottas 18 dhurs were recorded as bakasht malik in the possession of the kothi Rewari as ticcadars, 18 bighas 5 cottas 2 dhurs as the kasht of Mr. Manners who was one of the proprietors of the Rewari Factory and 65 bighas 5 cottas 14 dhurs as tenancy land in the names of various persons. The learned Subordinate Judge has assumed that the Record of Rights is in favour of the plaintiffs and he has come to the conclusion that the defendants have not been able to rebut the presumption of correct ness attaching to the entry in the Record of Rights, but this is not entirely correct. 18 bighas 5 cottas and 2 dhurs were undoubtedly recorded as the kasht of Mr. Manners and it is the case of both sides that in that Survey entry Mr. Manners stands for the factory. The learned Subordinate Judge accepts the position, but he says when it, namely, the 18 bighas 5 cottas and 2 dhurs of land, "was in kothi's possession during Cadastral Survey, it cannot but be held to be malik's lands unless any kashtkari right in the land is shown by the defendants." I am of opinion that this is not a correct way of stating the position. On the entry in the Record of Rights we must assume that 18 bighas 5 cottas 2 dhurs were the rai-yati lands of the kothi until the contrary is established. In regard to the 65 bighas 5 cottas and 14 dhurs of land they are undoubtedly shown as tenancy lands. The learned Subordinate Judge says:— These lands should also be taken to be malik's lands unless any rai-yati right therein is proved by the defendants. I regret to say that I am unable to follow the arguments. So far as 108 bighas are concerned, the Record of Rights may be taken to favour the case of the plaintiffs, but even here the position is not as easy as it looks. The Survey Authorities were only entitled to determine the question of possession. They found that this block of land comprising 108 bighas was in the possession of the kothi which was undoubtedly in the position of ticcadars. This being so, they recorded the lands as bakasht malik in the possession of ticcadars. The only question which is solved by the Survey Authorities is that these lands were in the cultivating possession of the ticcadars but as is well-known such an entry does not solve the question whether the land was held by the kothi as proprietors, tenure-holders, rai-yats or under-rai-yats. The term bakasht is the invention of the Survey Authorities and is used by them to denote the actual cultivating possession either of the proprietor or tenure-holders as the case may be. The term was deliberately invented to avoid the responsibility of deciding the character of the possession. I am willing, however, to assume that the entry in the Record of Rights is in favour of the plaintiffs.

I now proceed to deal with the question whether the defendants 1st party have been able to establish their claim. The first document upon which they rely is Ex. P. which is a certificate of sale dated the 24th May, 1913, granted by Ram Bahadur in Execution Case No. 7 of 1912. Ram Bahadur obtained a money-decree against the kothi in 1907. In execution of that decree they put up to sale and purchased four occupancy holdings of the kothi, namely, those covered by khata No. 451 (comprising an area of 18 bighas 5 cottas and 2 dhurs recorded as the occupancy holding of Mr. Manners in the Record of Rights) khata No. 613, khata No. 494 and khata No. 446. The certificate of sale definitely asserts that the kothi had occupancy rights in the lands sold and certifies that Ram Bahadur has purchased those rights. This document established that (1) Mr. Manners' holding was the holding of the factory and that the factory had occupancy rights in the land sold, (2) that *khata*s Nos. 451-M, 613M, 494 and 446 were the occupancy holdings of the factory. All these lands are the subject-matter of the suit and *khata*s Nos. 451 and 494 have been purchased by the defendants 1st party.

Now the plaintiffs are clearly bound by the statement of Ram Bahadur as contained in this document, for Ram Bahadur was one of the proprietors of the mouza at the date of the sale of the holdings in question and the plaintiffs have purchased the interest of Ram Bahadur in the mouza.

The next document upon which reliance is placed is Ex. 1 (5) which is a rent receipt dated the 9th February, 1914, granted by Musammat Jighri Begum to the Rewari Factory in respect of 165 bighas 2 cottas and 17 dhurs of rai-yati land. I may mention that Musammat Jighri Begum gave a usufructuary mortgage of half of her proprietary interest in the mouza. The rent receipt upon which reliance is placed is a receipt for the rent of 1320 and 1321 in respect of the portion which was in her khas possession. Musammat Jighri Begum is the predecessor-in-title of the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs are clearly bound by the recognition of the kothi as rai-yats by Musammat Jighri Begum. As I have said, the rent receipts were in respect of the rent due to Musammat Jighri Begum in 1320 and 1321, that is to say, for the period ending with September, 1914. The receipt was, however, granted on the 9th February, 1914. Mr. Sultan Ahmed contends that it is unlikely that the kothi would pay the rent seven months in advance but the answer is that the kothi sold some of these lands to the defendants 1st party on the 25th April, 1914, and they were called upon to discharge their obligations to their landlords before the conveyance in question Ex. I by which some of these lands were sold to the defendants 1st party on the 25th April, 1904, recites the fact that the rent to the landlord for 1321 has been paid by the kothi. Mr. Sultan Ahmed contends that the defendants should have called for counterfoil rent receipts and the account books from Musammat Jighri Begum's office to show that the rent was in fact received by her and a receipt granted by her, but the plaintiffs have themselves purchased whatsoever interest Musammat Jighri Begum had in this mouza, and all these documents would be expected to be in the possession of the plaintiffs.

As I read the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge, he does not reject Ex. I (5) as a fabricated document. He says the rent receipts purporting to have been given by the maliks are of a date subsequent to the Record of Rights. They are, therefore, not enough to establish any tenancy in the lands already recorded as proprietors' land in the Record of Rights. The argument, in my opinion, is wholly inadmissible. The Record of Rights, no doubt, raises a presumption in favour of the plaintiffs, but I know of no authority which establishes that the presumption of the correctness of the Record of Rights cannot be rebutted by producing evidence of a date subsequent to the Record of Rights. I may point out that the Record of Rights was published in 1897 and there was nothing to prevent Musammat Jighri Begum from recognising the kothi as occupancy tenants on the 9th February, 1914, which is the date of the receipt in question. A tenancy arises by virtue of such recognition and it is irrelevant to argue that unless the entry in the Record of Rights is shown to be wrong, the defendants 1st party cannot succeed in this action. The learned Judge then complains that Ajodheya Lal the Patwari of Musammat Jighri Begum who granted the receipt was not examined, but, in my opinion, this was not necessary since Sant Lal Misser proved these receipts. The learned Subordinate Judge then says that "this receipt appears to have been granted at a time when kothi's lease had already expired. Hence the receipt is useless and shows nothing in defendant's favour. I regret to say that I do not follow this argument. Although the kothi lease as ticcadars had expired they were claiming to hold the land in question as their raiya lands. Why the receipts should be useless in these circumstances it is impossible to understand. It has been properly proved and the documents which would disprove it are presumably in the possession of the plaintiffs as the successors-in-title of Musammat Jighri Begum. These documents have not been produced and I cannot have recourse to speculative arguments such as those which have been used in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge for refusing to draw the necessary inference from this rent receipt. I hold that on the 9th February, 1914, Musammat Jighri Begum recognised the kothi as *raiya*s in occupation of 165 bighas; 2 cot-tas 17 dhurs of land and that such recognition is binding upon the plaintiffs claiming title through Musammat Jighri Begum.

[His Lordship then referred to the other documents and proceeded:—]

When all the evidence is examined the only piece of evidence in favour of the plaintiffs is the entry in the Record of Rights, and I have already suggested that it is not as favourable to the plaintiffs as it is claimed to be. But in favour of the defendants there is evidence of recognition by Musammat Jighri Begum by Ram Bahadur and last by the plaintiffs themselves. Why should we decline to give effect to such recognition merely because the entry in the Record of Rights is in favour of the plaintiffs? As I have said the entry may be perfectly right as it stood in 1897; and yet the defendants may have been recognised by the landlord as tenants many years after.

There is another point which must be considered in this connection. The defendants complain that they were precluded by the learned Subordinate Judge from offering their evidence on this point for the purpose of establishing their kasht rights. Now the present suit was filed on the 1st May, 1922. The issues were settled on the 6th December, 1922. On the 7th December, 1922, the defendants filed certain documents with an unstamped petition. The order passed by the learned Subordinate Judge on this petition is as follows:—Defendants file certain documents along with an unstamped petition. No order can be passed as to its admissibility unless a petition duly stamped showing reasons of filing it late if filed. Stopping here for a moment, I may point out that the delay was only of one day, and under ordinary circumstances, it is quite possible for a party to have an idea as to what documents should be filed in the case until issues have been framed. The issues were actually framed on the 6th December, and, in my opinion, the learned Subordinate Judge should have exercised his discretion by accepting the documents on the 7th December. On the 21st December, 1922, the defendants filed those documents again with a petition stating reasons of delay. The learned Subordinate Judge passed the following order. Let them be kept with the record subject to admissibility at the time of hearing. Order XIII, r. 1 provides that the parties or their Pleaders shall produce at the first hearing of the suit, all the documentary evidence of every description in their possession or power, on which they intend to rely, and r. 2 provides that no documentary evidence in the possession or power of any party which should have been but has not been produced in accordance with the requirements of r. 1 shall be received at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless good cause is shown to the satisfaction of the Court for the non-production thereof and the Court receiving any such evidence shall record the reasons for so doing. As has been pointed out, O. XIII, r. 1 does not exclude the discretion of the Court to receive any such documentary evidence at any subsequent stage. Now on the 21st December, 1922, the learned Subordinate Judge clearly accepted the reasons of the delay and directed that they should be kept with the record subject to admissibility at the time of hearing. In my opinion the learned Subordinate Judge clearly exercised his discretion in favour of the defendants on the 21st December and received the documents and the only point that was left open for further consideration was whether the documents were relevant. If he were not satisfied with the explanation given by the defendants he should have declined to receive the documents on the 21st December, 1922.

Now this was the position on the 21st December, 1922. The case was subsequently opened and on the 17th July the defendants tendered these documents in the course of the examination of Sant Lal. The learned Subordinate Judge rejected the documents as filed late without any reasons. Now as I have said, they were filed in the first instance on the 7th December, 1922, the issues having been settled on the 6th December, 1922. He himself directed that the documents should be kept in the record on the 21st December, and, in my opinion, it was not open to him to reject these documents on the 17th July, 1923, not on the ground that they were irrelevant, but on the ground that they were filed late without any reason. Now, these documents are letters, rent receipts, jama-bandies etc., which according to Mr. Sushil Madhab Malik constitute every important evidence in his favour. All these documents were rejected by the learned Subordinate Judge with the result that all the defendants had were some of the rent receipts and the road cess return which had been filed by the plaintiffs. Mr. S. M. Mullick has tendered all these documents in evidence before us, and if the evidence already in the record did not satisfy me as to the claim of the defendants 1st party, I would in haste have remanded the case to the first Court with a direction that it should take evidence for the purpose of receiving the documents but as I am satisfied that the defendants 1st party have established their claim in this litigation, I do not think it necessary to make a direction in regard to these documents in favour of the defendants 1st party. In my opinion the defendants 1st party have established their claim and I would allow this appeal, set aside the judgment and the decree of the Court below and dismiss the suit with costs payable by the plaintiffs in both the Courts.

The appellants in the analogous appeal are the defendants 3rd party who rely upon the conveyances executed in their favour by the Kothi on the 15th June, 1915. On the finding arrived at in the main appeal, they are clearly entitled to succeed. The learned Subordinate Judge has found that they are the benamidars of the plaintiffs, but there was no issue on this point and no decision is called for so far as this question is concerned. The appeal must, therefore, be decreed.

A. BONNAN—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Torts—Causing detention of goods by Customs Authorities, whether actionable—Suit for damages—Limitation—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), ss. 36, 49—Sea Customs Act (VIII of 1878), ss. 18, 19A—Indian Merchandise Marks Act (IV of 1889)—Wrongful institution of civil suit—Action for damages, whether lies—Wrongfully obtaining injunction, whether actionable apart from malice—Undertaking for damages, how enforced—Separate suit or application to Court—Treating suit as application—Slander of goods, when actionable—Praising one's goods as superior to another's, whether slander—Malice, what constitutes—Special averment of slanderous words, necessity of.

The plaintiff and the defendants were dealers in 'Gold Flake' cigarettes. When the plaintiff's goods arrived in Bombay and Calcutta, the defendants who had, up to then, exclusive rights of selling the said cigarettes in India applied to the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta for orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods, on the ground among others that the importation of the said cigarettes by the plaintiff infringed their trade mark. The plaintiff's goods were accordingly detained by the Collectors. The defendants then filed two suits, one in Calcutta on the 11th May, 1922, and another in Bombay on the 22nd May, 1922. In the High Court of Calcutta the defendants obtained a temporary injunction against the plaintiff and this injunction was dissolved on the 8th June, 1922 on the plaintiff undertaking to place a certain sum in fixed deposit. In Bombay the defendants gave notice of motion for an injunction on the 23rd May, 1922, but on the plaintiff undertaking not to sell, the injunction was dissolved on the 19th June, 1922. The defendants' suits were finally dismissed by the Privy Council. Thereafter, on the 21st January, 1925, the plaintiff filed a suit against the defendants for damages, (a) for wrongfully and maliciously obtaining orders of detention from the Collectors, (b) for wrongfully and maliciously prosecuting the civil suits, (c) for similarly obtaining an injunction against the plaintiff, (d) for having applied for an injunction in the Bombay Court and compelled plaintiff to give an undertaking not to sell, and (e) for publishing various statements slandering the plaintiff's goods:

Held, (1) that the plaintiff was not entitled to any damages for detention by the Collectors as there was no mis-statement or malice on the defendants' part, and as the cause of action for such a claim was further barred by limitation under Art 36 of Sch. I of the Limitation Act; [p. 280, col. 1.]

(2) that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for the institution of the civil suits inasmuch as the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously, and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution; [p. 285, cols. 1 & 2.]

Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Syre (9) and Sorrell v. Smith (15), relied on.

(3) that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for injunction apart from any special undertaking given by the defendants inasmuch as apart from malice or want of probable cause a plaintiff cannot recover damages in an independent suit upon mere proof that an injunction was granted to restrain him from doing what has since been held to be within his rights; [p. 281, col. 1.]

Bhut Nath Pal Mistry v. Chandra Benode Pal Chowdhury (2), not followed.

(4) that the plaintiff was entitled to enforce an express undertaking for damages given by the defendants to the Court in the former suit at the time of the granting of the injunction, even though his proper remedy would have been to have applied to that Court to enforce the undertaking, and not by way of a separate suit; [p. 282, col. 2.]

(5) that the plaintiff could not seek for any relief in the suit in respect of his damages relating to the injunction proceedings in the Bombay Court in view of the consent order and undertaking in that Court and that this claim also was further barred by limitation; [p. 281, col. 1.]

(6) that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any damages on account of slander of goods inasmuch as the defendants had stated that their goods were superior to those of the plaintiff, with a view to push their own business and not with the direct object of injuring the plaintiff's business. [p. 288, col. 1.]

White v. Mellin (21), Lyne v. Nicholls (25) and Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. Ltd. v. Maison Talbot (26), relied on.

Per Rankin, C. J.—An undertaking to the Court in a suit is not such an undertaking as amounts to contract with the other party, nor does it ground any action at Common Law. It is to be enforced by application to the Court to which it was given and in the suit or proceeding in which it was given. The Court ought to be asked to enforce the undertaking within a reasonable time but there is no statutory period of limitation for enforcing the same. [p. 281, col. 2.]

Where an independent suit is necessary a mere application may have to be dismissed; but where the plaintiff has adopted a more formal and elaborate procedure than he should have adopted in applying to the correct Court, no lack of jurisdiction is involved and the question becomes one of costs and of discretion. [ibid]

Threats to litigate or threats to boycott are unlawful only where the purpose of the threat is "wilfully and ultroneously to injure the trade of another" as distinct from the purpose to forward one's trade. [p. 286, col. 2.]

If the words are uttered to an individual and repetition is not intended except to a limited extent general loss of custom cannot ordinarily be a direct and natural result of the limited slander. [p. 289, col. 1.]

Per C. C. Ghose, J.—In an action for damages for slander of goods the precise words complained of must be set out in the statement of claim; it is not sufficient to allege that the slanderer used such and such words or to that effect. [p. 294, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of Mr. Justice Pearson, dated the 25th January, 1926, in Suit No. 210 of '19 5, and reported as 94 Ind. Cas. 444.

Messrs. L. P. E. Pugh and W. W. K. Page, for the Appellants.

Messrs. C. Bagram and S. C. Mitter, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—This suit was instituted in January, 1925, for the recovery of about seven and half lacks of rupees as damages for a variety of acts done by the defendant Company. It was stated in the plaint that no part of the cause of action arose before February 1922.

The plaintiff towards the end of 1921 bought a large quantity of "Gold Flake" cigarettes on the terms that they should not be sold in Great Britain. The goods were two years old, they were made up in packets or cartons of tin, and 25,000 cigarettes in their cartons were packed, in a strong tin lined case. This brand of cigarettes is very well-known as having originally been the manufacture of W. D. & H.O. Wills of Bristol whose successors in business are the British American Tobacco Company Limited. The goods so bought by the plaintiff had (under a temporary arrangement necessitated apparently by the war) been manufactured in America and were part of a very large number of cigarettes which had originally been intended for troops but which were now being disposed of. They had been manufactured by the British American Tobacco Company Limited itself and were thus genuine 'Gold Flake' cigarettes and not counterfeit. The plaintiff bought them cheap at eight or nine shillings per thousand.

His case is that he contracted to buy 860 cases being $21\frac{1}{2}$ million cigarettes, that he disposed of some (apparently 194 cases) in Egypt and elsewhere, and that early in 1922 he came to India not merely to dispose of 666 cases already contracted for but also with a view to establish a continuing market in these War stocks of which further supplies in very large quantities were available or would become available.

Now "Gold Flake" cigarettes were and are sold in large quantities in India by the defendant Company which is a "subsidiary" or "associated" Company of the British American Tobacco Company Limited, the latter Company holding at least 80 per cent. of its share. The defendant Company had in 1910 acquired the business and trade mark rights of the British American Tobacco Company Limited so far as India, Burma and Aden are concerned. For years it alone had been selling Gold Flake cigarettes in India and its price to dealers was

Rs. 36 per thousand. It obtained its goods from the British American Tobacco Company in Great Britain though it had itself the right to manufacture. It sold fresh goods of British make taking back from dealers any unsold goods that were old and unlikely to be sound. It brought out its "Gold Flake" cigarettes not only in tin lined cases but in sealed tins of fifty packet in such cases.

The plaintiff's venture was a very promising one. He could afford to sell at a price far below the defendant Company's price of Rs. 36 per thousand. If he could dispose at a start of some 16 million cigarettes at Rs. 20 per thousand he would do very well for himself and if he could continue so to do he would do very well indeed. There were, however, at least two danger spots. So long as the public would regard his merchandise as good Gold Flake cigarettes they would prefer his article because of the price. But old cigarettes do not "stand up to the monsoon" so well as might be wished and when once the tin lined case was opened, if not before, there was certain to be deterioration after June. That was one risk. The second was this. It was all very well to throw the defendant Company out of the Indian market despite their purchase of the Gold Flake trade mark and business but the defendant Company might conceive themselves entitled to object and this might mean litigation. How far either of these risks had been considered by the plaintiff in advance it is difficult to say. Whether they were considered in combination I do not know at all.

The venture began well. The plaintiff having arrived in Bombay on the 7th February 1922, with samples sold no less than 220 cases to a Bombay firm Messrs. Irani Hormuz Sheriar and Company at Rs. 23-8 per thousand. His Counsel on this appeal has referred to the correspondence passing between the offices of the defendant Company at Calcutta and Bombay and between them and their London advisers as showing that he was "tearing their trade in Gold Flake cigarettes to shreds." It seems to me that at first the defendant Company's advisers in India did not appreciate this partly because they thought the goods would not last but in fact it is clear that the matter was one of great importance to the defendant Company. Mr. Abbott's letter of 15th March, Mr. Macnaghten's cable received on 5th April and the cable of 10th April (which has been ruled out by the learned Judge for reasons which I do not appreciate) show what happened. The Company's Solicitors in India did not think they could do anything. Mr. Macnaghten in England advised that they could. He knew all about the defendant Company's trade marks and in a matter of this sort and of this importance it was most reasonable to take advice in London. It was after all a question of Trade Mark Law and Mr. Macnaghten was their legal adviser. It seems idle to suggest that the plaintiff has a grievance because the defendant Company took advice from him.

The defendant Company decided to take steps to establish that the plaintiff's scheme was an invasion of their rights. They thought it wise to take a formal assignment of the marks by way of perfecting their equitable title under the Indenture of 1910 and this was not completed till the 10th May, 1922. Meanwhile they applied under the Sea Customs Act to the Collector of Customs at Calcutta and at Bombay on 12th April and 1st May. The applications are in evidence and state that the goods are liable to confiscation because "we consider that the importation of the above goods into India is an infringement of our trade mark." Indemnity bonds were given to the Collectors in the usual course and letters written to the plaintiff asking for an assurance that the goods would not be sold in India and threatening legal proceedings to restrain this. Matters really stood over to abide the result of an interview between the plaintiff and the defendant Company's Directors which took place on the 8th May. Suits were filed by the defendant Company in Calcutta on 11th May and in Bombay on 22nd May. On 2nd May, 1922, the Collector of Customs at Bombay ordered the detention of the goods till 1st June as the defendant Company said there was an infringement of their Trade Mark and in order to enable them to file a suit. On the 3rd May plaintiff's Solicitors objected and after taking advice from the Government Law Officer the Collector released the goods by his letter of the 5th May.

The Collector of Customs Calcutta did nothing till 22nd April when he wrote the clearing agents Samuel Fitzee and Company asking what they had to say. On 11th May an interim injunction had been obtained from the Court. From an order recorded by the Collector upon another matter—the assessment of the plaintiff's cigarettes for duty—we know exactly how he dealt with the case. He was under no misapprehension as to the fact that the plaintiff's goods had been manufactured by the British American Tobacco Company and were in that—the ordinary—sense genuine, but he thought there was a prima facie case for holding that the trade mark imported that the goods were the defendant Company's and that accordingly its use by other dealer was pro tanto a counterfeit. This contention is certainly far-fetched and indeed erroneous and the goods were not really within the provisions of the Sea Customs Act, s. 18 at all. The relevant clause speaks of "goods having applied thereto a counterfeit trade mark within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code, or a false trade description within the meaning of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, 1889." Any detention in Calcutta after 11th May was by virtue of the interim injunction of that date. The detention under the Sea Customs Act was from 1st to (say) 7th May in Bombay and from 12th April to 11th May in Calcutta.

The chief importance of this matter lies in the fact that the learned Judge thinks that the defendant Company in applying for detention of these goods under the Sea Customs Act were acting maliciously. It is clear that the facts as to the origin of the goods were made quite clear to the Collectors of Customs and were not in any wise misstated in either application, both of which gave—as the ground—"infringement of our trade mark rights." But it is said that if one looks at cl. (d) of s. 18 of the Act it is apparent that the defendant Company were maliciously accusing the plaintiff of a criminal offence and fraud, and were asking for a detention to which they knew they had no right.

It is desirable to add that there do not appear to be any regulations under s. 19-A of the Sea Customs Act but proceedings of the character now in question are governed in practice by certain "Instructions for the observance of Customs Officers" published under authority of the Government of India in The Merchandise Marks Manual. As I read these instructions they provide that if the 'informant' is willing to give an indemnity bond the Collector unless he is of opinion that there is clearly no reasonable cause for detention will detain the goods for a month in order to allow of a suit being brought and if a suit is instituted will detain them until a final decision by the highest Appellate Court to which the matter is taken.

The learned Judge has held that the plaintiff cannot now recover damages against the defendant Company for the detention of his goods by the Collectors of Customs at Bombay or Calcutta. In his opinion Art. 26 of the Limitation Act applies and Art. 48 does not apply. Section 24 of the Limitation Act does not assist the plaintiff here—if only because it is impossible to hold that the special damage flowing from these detentions in May and June 1922 did not result before the end of that year. The only contention, therefore, which need be referred to is that urged upon us by the plaintiff's Counsel that Art. 49 applies because though the detention was by the Collectors, nevertheless, the defendant Company moved them to detain and are responsible for the detention as for their own act. In my opinion this argument fails whether as construction of Art. 49 or otherwise. It is quite true that "all persons in trespass who aid or counsel, direct or join are joint trespassers." Petric v. Lamont (1); but the wrong done by the Collectors here is that being lawfully in possession of the plaintiff's goods they wrongfully, i.e., contrary to their duty refused to deliver possession to him and so their possession became unlawful. This is what is contemplated by the concluding words of the first and third columns of Art. 49. But this cannot possibly be predicated of the defendant Company who never had possession of the goods. I think, therefore, that the learned Judge was right in holding that this cause of action is time-barred under Art. 36.

The defendant Company filed two suits against the plaintiff—one in this Court and one in the High Court of Bombay. The Calcutta suit was filed on 11th May, 1922, and an interim injunction was on that day obtained ex parte from Mr. Justice Greaves restraining the plaintiff from removing from Bond or dealing with 100 cases lying with the Customs. The defendant Company gave an undertaking in damages. On the 8th June the motion for an interlocutory injunction was disposed of in the presence of both parties. The plaintiff undertook to deposit Rs. 20,000 (less certain charges) in fixed deposit in the Alliance Bank and the interim injunction was dissolved. There is no suggestion of any false statement or suppression made by the defendant Company on this occasion. Indeed, on asking to be referred to the affidavits I am informed that they were not even put in evidence in the present case. The suit came on for hearing promptly. It was heard by the same learned Judge whose decree in this case is now under appeal and was dismissed by him on 18th July, 1922. An appeal to this Court was dismissed on 10th April, 1923, and an appeal to His Majesty in Council shared the same fate on 13th May, 1924.

The suit in Bombay was filed on 22nd May, 1922, and notice of motion for an injunction was given for 2nd June. It was heard on 19th June—that is after the injunction given in Calcutta had been dissolved. On the 19th June the matter was settled by cross-undertakings: The plaintiff undertook pending the hearing not to sell any cigarettes then in Bombay or to arrive in Bombay and the defendant Company undertook in damages. The plaintiff's undertaking not to sell was discontinued by order of the Court on 2nd August, 1922, (soon after the Calcutta suit had been dismissed by the trial Judge) on his agreeing to keep an account, and this undertaking to keep an account came to an end by order of 20th September, 1923, by which time the appeal in Calcutta had been dismissed). The suit was abiding the result of the Calcutta case and the appeals therein and was dismissed on 10th November, 1924, after the decision of the Privy Council in that case.

The plaintiff says that these suits were brought maliciously and without probable cause and that he is entitled to damages accordingly; including, as I understand, damages for the harm done to his business by the litigation which discouraged dealers from buying goods which might land them in trouble. He says further that in this suit, and apart altogether from the defendant Company's undertakings in damages, he can in these circumstances recover damages in respect of the Calcutta injunction and of his own undertaking not to sell given to the Bombay Court. It has further been maintained on his behalf—more particularly on the authority of Bhut Nath Pal Mistry v. Chandra Benode Pal

(1) (1842) 1 Car. & Marsh. 96.

Chowdhury. (2), that so far as the Calcutta injunction is concerned, the obtaining of it was an act in the nature of trespass to property and it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove malice or any want of probable cause.

At least two of these contentions appear to me to be wrong. The plaintiff has (if he has not lost it by delay) the right to apply to the High Court of Bombay to give him damages pursuant to the cross-undertakings given to that Court on 19th June, 1922. In no other way can he get damages for carrying out his own undertaking whether the suit was or was not malicious or an abuse of process. I agree entirely on this point with the learned Judge.

That, apart from malice or want of probable cause, a plaintiff can recover damages in an independent suit (and apart from any undertaking given by the defendant), upon mere proof that an injunction was granted to restrain him from doing what has since been held to be within his rights—this too is a proposition I dissent from. It is to be found in the case cited but it proceeds upon a misunderstanding of such cases as Clissold v. Cratchley (3) which are cases where trespass was committed and the defendant unsuccessfully set up as his justification an order of the Court which was disregarded because it was irregularly obtained by the defendant. To speak of an injunction as on a par with such a case as being an act "in the nature of trespass to property," is merely to obscure matters by a false analogy or else to beg the question. Section 95 of the Civil Procedure Code is rendered almost absurd by such a doctrine.

On the 11th of May, 1922, when the interim injunction was obtained in Calcutta restraining the plaintiff from removing from bond or selling or disposing of 100 cases of cigarettes then lying with the Customs, the defendant Company gave an express undertaking in damages. This was an undertaking to the Court and the character of such an undertaking has been discussed in the case of Smith v. Day (4). It is not such an undertaking as amounts to contract with the other party, nor does it ground any action at Common Law. It is to be enforced by application to the Court to which it was given and in the suit or proceeding in which it was given. The right to ask for an enquiry as to damages thereunder may be lost by delay but there is no rule that an enquiry must be asked for when the injunction is dissolved or when the suit is decided: Ex parte Hall, In re Wood (5). It is clear now that although the granting of an enquiry as to damages is a matter upon which the Court exercises its judicial discretion, it is not necessary that the party aggrieved by the interlocutory injunction should show that his opponent suppressed material facts or otherwise obtained the injunction by improper means: Griffith v. Blake (6). In the present case the plaintiff before taking action waited until the defendant Company's appeal had been disposed of by the Privy Council but he commenced this suit promptly thereafter. This in substance satisfies the general rule that "the Court ought to be asked to enforce the undertaking within a reasonable time after it is ascertained that the injunction has been improperly granted." See Ex parte Hall, In re Wood (5). No limitation is provided by Indian Statute Law for an application to enforce an undertaking given to the Court. It is, I think, clear that the plaintiff has brought an independent suit when for this purpose he should not have done so but this Court has jurisdiction to treat his suit as though it were an application made in the previous suit since it happens that both proceedings are in the same Court and have been dealt with by the same Judge. Where an independent suit is necessary a mere application may have to be dismissed; but where the plaintiff has adopted a more formal and elaborate procedure than he should have adopted in applying to the correct Court, no lack of jurisdiction is involved and the question becomes one of costs and of discretion. If the plaintiff had launched an application in the previous suit and asked that it should stand for hearing until the matter had been finally decided in appeal, he would have taken a very reasonable course. I consider also that in this case an inquiry as to damages could not have been refused as there is every reason to think that the interlocutory injunction would interfere with his chance to sell his cigarettes. [cf. Graham v. Campbell (7)].

For these reasons it hardly appears to be necessary for the decision of this case that we should discuss the proposition that if A maliciously and without probable cause brings a suit against B and without suppression of facts, mis-statements or other improper means, obtains an interlocutory injunction, an action will lie at Common Law for the damage done to his business by the injunction. But I think it right to say that this proposition is one to which I refuse assent. I respectfully agree with the observations of Fletcher, J., in Mohini Mohan Misser v. Surendra Narain Singh (8) and with the decision in that case. It is the duty of a Judge before granting an injunction to satisfy himself that the plaintiff is not without reasonable and probable cause—indeed to satisfy himself, that it will stand a higher test. Unless the malice of the plaintiff results in some form of mis-statement or leads the plaintiff to suppress some fact or facts it was his duty to lay before the Court, I have much difficulty in seeing how the granting of the injunction is causally related to the plaintiff's act or state of mind. The present case is probably unique in that no attempt is made to prove what was laid before the Court or that it contained any element of falsity. The granting of an injunction is a judicial act in the fullest sense: it is not a ministerial order or an order of course or mesne process or a necessary incident of any particular jurisdiction. The Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyri (9) is not really directed to the present question but to the question whether a plaintiff has a cause of action from the mere bringing of a suit or other proceeding. I observe that in one well-known text book (Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, 7th Edition, page 654) it is suggested that the observations in that case (at page 684) made by Brett, M. R., show that in no case can a person who has maliciously and unreasonably set the law in motion absolve himself from the consequences which he invited and brought to pass, by the suggestion that their immediate cause was a mistake on the part of the Judge. On this view doubt is thrown upon Daniels v. Fielding (10). A careful perusal of the learned Judge's argument in criticism of what Martin, B., said in Johnson v. Emerson (11) leads me to think that this is a misunderstanding of what he said. His point is that damage to credit results from the mere present action of a bankruptcy petition and that Martin, B., has failed to notice this special feature of that kind of petition. Of the proposition imputed to him I think it quite likely that he would have thought as of Martin, B.'s doctrine—its fault is that it is too large.

There is nothing in the second subsection of s. 95 of the Code or in Art. 40 of the First Schedule of the Limitation Act, 1908, which is inconsistent with what I have already said. These indeed are curious places in which to expect to find the law as to the conditions upon which a suit for damages caused by an injunction is sustainable, and it cannot be disputed that upon some conditions such a suit is competent as where an injunction has been procured by fraud.

For reasons already given I think, however, that it is within our power to make an order such as would have been more properly asked for by an application in a previous suit. But as a large body of evidence has been taken in this case and as the plaintiff has sought the judgment of the Court as to the amount of damages to which he is entitled, I propose that in ordering the inquiry this Court should give a decision upon one important matter for the guidance of the officer conducting the inquiry. I refer here to the question whether or not the plaintiff can as part of the damages caused by the injunction, recover damages for loss caused to him by the cancellation of two contracts for the purchase of cigarettes from Messrs. Venis and Company. In para. 18 of the plaint the plaintiff says that the Army and Canteen Board cancelled 258 cases of cigarettes by reason of which he was put to a loss of Rs. 1,09,549. In para. 16 he says that 160 cases, portion of 220 cases which he had contracted to sell in Bombay have not been shipped to India, but in Ex. O as the summary of his claim which the learned Judge has acted upon, he definitely states of these 160 cases also that they were cancelled by sellers in England. Now it appears that the cancellations relied upon are cancellations made by the plaintiff himself and not by his sellers. On the 17th of May, 1922, he wrote to Messrs. Venis and Company "Regarding my order of the 24th December for five million cigarettes, I very much regret to inform you that owing to an injunction served upon me by Messrs. Imperial Tobacco Co. of India Ltd., here which restrains me from importing these goods, I shall not be able to take delivery of the cigarettes and, therefore, please cancel same and oblige." On the 6th June, 1922, he wrote to Messrs. Venis and Co., "I am in receipt of your letter of the 16th May for which I thank you. I note that you can still make arrangements for the delivery of the goods. But I regret to inform you that owing to an injunction brought against me by the Imperial Tobacco Co. in India, I am restrained from importing these goods and they have commenced proceedings against me. Therefore I regret I cannot accept your kind proposition. Thanking you for the same." This is said to refer to 6 million cigarettes. Now the Calcutta injunction was granted ex parte on the 11th of May and referred only to 100 cases then lying with the Customs. The injunction was dissolved on the 8th of June. As I understand the reasoning of Brett, L. J., in Smith v. Day (4) damages to be paid by virtue of an undertaking are not necessarily confined to proximate and natural damages but may be enlarged either by reason that the opposite party had notice of all the circumstances or by reason that the case is one for the giving of exemplary damages in view of fraud or malice. But it is to my mind reasonably clear that in respect of neither cancellation was the plaintiff's conduct rendered reasonable by the ex parte injunction; as to the 100 cases in Calcutta, the plaintiff did not even wait to see what view the Court would take when he appeared to put his case before it. The Court in fact dissolved the injunction on the 8th June. The plaintiff's conduct may well have been reasonable in the sense that he now saw that he was involved in litigation about questions of "Trade Mark" law or by reason of the fact that he was not prepared to peril too much upon his chances of success. His claim that the contracts were cancelled against him is anything but candid and I am of opinion that this matter ought not to be canvassed again at the enquiry which we direct. It is upon this condition only that I am prepared to direct such enquiry.

I turn now to consider whether the plaintiff is entitled to damages by reason of the mere bringing and prosecution of the suits in Calcutta and Bombay. I do not doubt that the existence of this litigation came readily and quickly to the notice of the trade. I do not doubt that the agents of the defendant Company informed their customers in the trade and the persons whom they employed to canvass for orders, of the facts that they had started these proceedings. I do not doubt either that some dealers refused to buy the plaintiff's goods because they did not wish to offend the defendant Company; others because the defendant Company would refuse to deal with them or to deal with them on the same favourable terms as before; others because they anticipated that they too might become involved in litigation if they dealt in plaintiff's goods; others again because they were definitely informed that the defendant Company were prepared to assert their rights to prevent the plaintiff's cigarettes being sold in India by bringing whatever suits were necessary to establish and enforce their alleged right. The learned Judge has held "that the defendant Company made full use of the litigation in Bombay and Calcutta with its attendant threat of trouble to others as an obstruction to the plaintiff and as a deterrent." He has further held that the suits "were throughout designed as a disparagement of the plaintiff's goods and an obstruction to the unfettered exercise of his rights as a trader, of which I have no doubt the Company made the fullest use the whole time of the litigation lasted and whenever occasion so required." These observations of the learned Judge are to be coupled with his finding that the defendant Company were actuated by malice and that their case had no reasonable or probable cause.

These findings taken broadly make an impressive case of hardship and oppression. It is, however, necessary to remember that while the plaintiff might have been well entitled to seize the opportunity afforded by the existence of war stocks, to drive the de-defendant Company out of the market, he was not in law entitled to rely upon the defendant's passivity in the face of his laudable endeavour the defendant Company were certainly entitled, if they chose, to protect themselves by refusing to deal at all with any person who sold the plaintiff's goods. This complaint may be put upon one side. The rest of this formidable indictment may, I think, be examined under two heads: The first head is the bringing of the suits; the second is the question of threats. As regards the bringing of the suits I think the relevant authorities are Savile v. Roberts (12) and Quartz Hill's case (9) already cited to which I would add Wren v. Wield (13), Pitt v. Donovan (14). The recent case of Sorrel v. Smith (15), although the immediate subject-matter is illegal combination or conspiracy, is I think particularly valuable because it takes account of the right of a rival trader to forward or defend his trade and it examines the notion of malice in connection therewith.

Where damages are sought for the mere bringing and prosecution of a civil suit two main questions emerge. The first question is the leading element in Quartz Hill's case (9). That question is a question of the remoteness of the damage. The mere institution of the proceedings may having regard to their character involve damage to credit or reputation, damage to property in the sense that the defendant is put to expense, or damage to the person in the sense that he is liable to arrest. In such cases that damage is not remote but in any ordinary case "the broad canon is true that in the present day, and according to our present law, the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously, and however great the want of reasonable and proper cause, will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution.....The Counsel for the plaintiff Company have argued this case with great ability, but they could not point to a single instance since Westminster Hall began to be the seat of justice in which an ordinary action, similar to the actions of the present day, has been considered to justify a subsequent action on the ground that it was brought maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause." Quartz Hill's case (9). Lord Bowen in saying this had clearly before his mind that incidentally matters connected with the action, such as the publication of the proceedings in the action, may do a man an injury; and Brett, M. R., in deciding that a petition to wind up a Company was within the exception mentioned in Savile v. Roberts (12), stated "the present case, therefore, is reduced to this question, namely: is a petition to wind up a Company more like an action charging fraud or more like a bankruptcy petition." If injury to the fair fame of a person is not for this purpose a consequence of an action charging fraud, it is impossible to contend that injury to his business is, in such a case as the present, a consequence of the mere bringing of the suit.

The second question which arises in cases of this sort is as to what is meant by malice. When we turn from criminal prosecutions to civil cases special consideration is here necessary. A prosecutor has no right to employ the process of the Criminal Court save for the purpose of vindicating public order and justice. If there is no reasonableness in his charge, that of itself raises at least a suggestion that he is acting from some other motive and that he is serving some private end in an oblique and improper manner. This may be mere spite or it may be something quite different such as the desire, by abuse of the criminal process to obtain money or other properties or to induce the person prosecuted to come to a compromise. Now in a civil suit the obtaining of money or property or the assertion of valuable rights is the declared object of the plaintiff. He is entitled, if he thinks that he has chances of success, to put the matter to the test and in this way it is daily experience that Courts of Law are invited to do things which it would be most unreasonable for them to do. When two people are competing for the same market success on the part of the one necessarily involves injury to the other except indeed the market be capable of expansion so as to admit them both. Holt, C. J., in Savile v. Roberts (12) in dealing with the second "objection" gives this answer: "There is a great difference between the suing of an action maliciously, and the indicting of a man maliciously. When a man sues an action, he claims a right to himself, or complains of an injury done to him; and if a man fancies he has a right, he may sue an action.....If then the law will permit a man to make a false claim out of a Court of Justice, (i. e., outside a Court of Justice) a fortiori when he proceeds to assert his right in a legal course." In Wren v. Wiold (13) Blackburn, J., stated "that an action may be brought under such circumstances as to render it morally wrong and injurious in fact, is certain, though the authorities leave it in doubt whether, under any circumstances, the person so sued can recover damages for the vexation and annoyance caused to him by the false suit." He refers to the case reported in Maynard's Long Quinto, "that for bringing a suit so manifestly wrongful to the defendant's own knowledge, an action might be maintained." He refers to a case of Sir G. Gerard v. Dickenson (16) where the defendant had brought a suit alleging against her own knowledge that a certain lease, which was a forgery and which she knew was a forgery gave her title to the land. It is clear from his judgment that the furthest limit to which Blackburn, J., was prepared to go was that "if a man sue me in a proper Court, yet if his suit be utterly without ground of truth, and that certainly known to himself, I may have an action of the case against him for the undue vexation and damage that he putteth me unto by his ill-practice." The case before him was one in which the defendant had warned persons who had purchased or were intending to purchase machines from the plaintiff, that the machines sold by the plaintiff were infringements of the defendant's patents and that if they used the machines he would claim royalties and should take legal proceedings. The actual decision was as follows: "If, therefore, the plaintiffs had given evidence, on which the Jury might properly find that the defendant made the communication to the intended purchasers mala fide, and without any intention to institute legal proceedings at all against the purchasers, so that it was not a step taken in support of his real or fancied right against the purchasers, but entirely out of malice against the plaintiff, or on which the Jury might have properly found that the defendant did not (to use Lord Holt's phrase) so much as fancy he had a right, but, as Lord Hobart says, knew certainly that his claim was utterly without ground of truth, we are inclined to think that it would have been proper to leave that evidence to the Jury in support of the plaintiff's allegation that the defendant's letter was false and malicious." In the judgment of Lord Cave, L. C., in Sorrell v. Smith (15) it is stated in effect that there is some authority for the view that it is actionable for one person wilfully to injure a man in his trade if damage results to him. This, however, is guarded by a proviso to the effect that if the real purpose is not to injure another, but to forward or defend one's own trade, then no wrong is committed and no action will lie, although damage to another ensues. Of malice the Lord Chancellor stated this: "In some cases 'malice' is postulated as an element in the tort which I am considering. If the word means only that the act complained of is wilfully and knowingly done, or that it is done for the purpose of injuring another, then it is rightly used in this connection. But there is a tendency to interpret 'malice' as connoting personal enmity or spite or some other evil motive, and as such a motive is neither an essential element in the offence nor conclusive of the offence having been committed, it seems better to forego the use of the word."

I propose in view of these authorities to consider in the light of the judgment of the learned Judge whether the defendant's suit was brought with the knowledge that it had no chance of success and for purposes other than the purpose of endeavouring to establish in Courts of Law that the defendant Company had the right to object to the plaintiff's importations and whether the defendant Company's desire was to injure the trade of the plaintiff as distinct from the desire to forward or defend its own trade. It is suggested that the defendant Company's case was essentially absurd because the plaintiff Company's cigarettes had been made in America by the successors of W. D. and H. O. Willis of Bristol. Two cases have been cited to us which I think dispose of this contention, Imperial Tobacco Co., (Newfoundland) Ltd., v. Duffy (17) and Dunlop Rubber Co. v. Booth & Co. (18). It is necessary, therefore, to see whether it can be imputed to the defendant Company that their superior officers were well aware that they had no case for claiming that their assignment of all the Indian rights in the Will's trade mark, should carry a similar consequence. It cannot I think be contended on a perusal of the proceedings at the trial or in appeal that the defendant Company were treated by the Courts as persons advancing an idle claim. The case offered no little scope for dispute upon the principles of law applicable. Nor was it one in which the careful sifting of somewhat numerous and complicated considerations was unnecessary. The learned Judge who tried the case gave a very clear analysis of the whole matter but I do not find in his judgment dismissing the suit an indication that he found the decision of it to be noticeably free from difficulty. In matters of trade mark law the Directors of a Company are necessarily in the hands of their legal advisers. In this case they had received from the Solicitors in India, advice to the effect that the law was against them. Their legal experts in London took another view for the reason, as I think that they failed fully to appreciate the consequences in India of the lack of statutory title to a trade mark. These consequences have in the course of the case been worked out with reference to s. 22 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905 which authorises the "splitting up" of a trademark territorially. In any view the burden of proof lies heavily upon the plaintiff to show that the defendant Company were persuaded that Mr. Macnaghten was wrong and the Indian Solicitors were right. In deciding appeal to the Courts of Law they must have known not merely that they were committing themselves to some expense but that they were taking the risk of an adverse decision which might affect them seriously in future. If the learned Judge has meant to find that the defendant Company throughout the whole history of the litigation was intentionally riding for a fall, that they were not really endeavouring or hoping to establish by a judicial decision the right which they claim, but well-knowing that they would ultimately lose, brought the actions for the sole purpose of obstructing plaintiff in the exercising of rights which they knew to be his, I respectfully differ from his conclusion. It certainly was, not merely the object, but the declared purpose of the defendant Company to prevent the plaintiff from selling these cigarettes in India. The plaintiff had at least several opportunities for considering whether the case made against him was transparently hollow. One was when he gave his undertaking to the Bombay High Court; another was when he decided to cancel the two contracts with Venis & Co. already mentioned. I do not know what transpired on the 8th of June, 1922, before Mr. Justice Greaves, but his order puts the plaintiff upon terms as to making a deposit with the Alliance Bank as a condition of dissolving the ex parte injunction. I will assume for the present purpose that in applying to the Collector of Customs the Directors acted mala fide in the sense that they claimed a relief to which they knew that they had no right. Even so it is a different question whether in taking steps to approach a Court of Law for the decision of their claim, they knew that they had no right whatever or were merely suing to serve an oblique and improper purpose. The plaintiff has, in my opinion, wholly failed to show that either suit was brought mala fide, without belief that the defendant Company had any reasonable cause or from oblique motives other than a motive to make their case good in furtherance of their own trade interests. I do not see that their case, though it turned out to be bad and has been overruled for reasons which I do not presume to challenge, was in any way such as to make it wrong or unreasonable for them to lay it before the Court.

With regard to the allegation that the defendant Company maliciously threatened to harass the plaintiff's customers with vexatious litigation, I do not know what threats in particular if any the learned Judge has considered to be proved and I fail to find this allegation in the plaint. It appears to me that what I have already said is sufficient to dispose of any question as to threats—whether threats to litigate or threats to boycott, as such threats are unlawful only where the purpose of the threat is "wilfully and ultroneously to injure the trade of another" as distinct from the purpose to forward one's trade: Sorell v. Smith (15).

The plaintiff further claims damages for what is sometimes shortly called "slander of goods," i. e., for statements false, made maliciously or without lawful occasion, and causing him special damage.

Paragraph 11 of the plaint pleads this cause of action as follows: "The defendant Company through its officers, servants and agents throughout India rumoured and caused to be rumoured and circulated statements to the effect that the Gold Flake cigarettes imported by the plaintiff were inferior in quality and otherwise than they represented to be, and they were otherwise than in a sound and good merchantable condition and that they were inferior to those by the defendant Company, that they were not genuine Gold Flake cigarettes, and that the plaintiff had no right to import and sell them as such."

The allegation of special damage refers to all the other grievances as well as to this, viz., the injunction, the detention by the Customs, and two suits, etc. Paragraph 12 states: "By reason of the aforesaid conduct and acts of the defendant Company, its servants, agents, etc., the plaintiff failed to find a market for the cigarettes imported and arranged by him to be imported into India and agents and dealers refused to purchase and sell or advertise or expose for sale the said cigarettes imported by the plaintiff as aforesaid with the result that by reason of the said wrongful and malicious acts and conduct of the defendant Company, the plaintiff was put to considerable loss and expenses particulars whereof are hereinafter set out." Speaking roughly the special damage for which he claims is his whole loss by reason of the failure of his venture.

The pleadings disclose no particulars of the time when, person to whom, or by whom the alleged "rumours" were set on foot—in fact no particulars of publication whatsoever nor any specific statement what on any occasion was actually said. No particulars were applied for.

The trial took place in November, and December, 1925. In July, 1925, the plaintiff examined one witness on commission in Bombay and in August, 1925, another before this Court de bene esse. From the evidence of the former Merwan Hormusji Irani the defendant Company got before trial notice of two occasions on which slander of goods was said to have been uttered. In the evidence of the latter (a dismissed servant of the defendant Company called Carr) I cannot see that there is any indication of or reference to any slander now relied upon or anything else that looks like slander of goods. The defendant Company in August examined de bene esse Mr. Abbott their Chairman and I see in his cross-examination no reference to any other slanders uttered by him or in his presence save a reference to one of the two occasions already mentioned. The witnesses examined by the defendant Company in July on commission in Bombay are asked nothing about slanders.

At the hearing in December, 1925, the plaintiff called nine witnesses including himself. The plaintiff's evidence-in-chief upon this part of the case forms questions 258 to 266 and contains only the most harmless hearsay. The only witnesses called to speak to any question of slander of goods are Ardeshir Khodadad, Kali Pada Roy, N. N. Chakrabarti and M. N. Jarvar. The learned Judge deals specifically with two only of the alleged slanders—one said to have been uttered by Carr to Khodadad in March or April 1922 and another said to have been uttered by Mr. Ryan and Akhil Pal in July 1922 to Kali Pada Roy and his partner's father N. N. Chakrabarty.

On the hearing of this appeal it appeared to us that this part of the case as presented by the pleadings was not at the time of the trial in a fit condition to be tried and that it would be as well to require a statement from the plaintiff of particulars of those slanders which he claimed to have proved. Accordingly particulars were filed alleging 13 several publications five of which were, in our opinion, afterthoughts in no way within para. 11 of the plaint and dealt with neither by cross-examination nor by the learned Judge as substantive counts in the case. The attempt made was intelligible in view of the plaintiff's difficulties as to limitation. These five new counts are based upon letters and the charge is that the defendant Company published them to their typists and staff, to the Collector of Customs and the Imperial Bank. It seems reasonably clear that neither Counsel nor the learned Judge at the trial were aware that they were assisting at the investigation of any such case. In my opinion these counts must be disallowed altogether. They appear to amount to be a contention that for the defendant Company even to claim that the plaintiff's goods infringed their trade mark rights was an actionable wrong.

There remain eight allegations of slander of goods and it is our duty to examine each in the light of the findings of fact come to by the learned Judge. As I read his judgment the only finding of untrue statements made by any one for whom the defendant Company can be responsible is that while it is true that the plaintiff's goods were old and true, that his packing was inferior to the defendants, the defendant Company's servants when warning dealers that these were not the goods of the defendant Company "impressed on dealers a non-existent difference in the quality of the goods." This seems to be a slender foundation for an action of this character brought against a rival trader and I am not surprised that learned Counsel for the plaintiff is not quite content with it.

[His Lordship then referred to the evidence and proceeded:—]

With regard to these allegations of slander of goods, as the defendant Company did not choose to apply for particulars I am quite prepared to hold that the plaintiff may found upon any occasion as to which he made a substantive case at the trial including the occasion spoken to by M. M. Jarvar who was his last witness called, provided always that the case made comes fairly within para. 11 of the plaint. But I am not prepared to allow the plaintiff to pick out new cases from the correspondence or from answers given in cross-examination by the plaintiff's witnesses.

It will be observed that all the occasions on which slander of goods is specified except the twelfth and thirteenth (which refer to letters, dated 1st and 14th January, 1924, sent to the Imperial Bank) are occasions in 1922. The learned Judge has held that they are covered by Art. 36 of the Limitation Act and are time-barred. But he says that it is "a fair inference to draw from the evidence that the statements alleged and complained of continued to the extent already mentioned to be repeated within two years before suit." Accordingly, as I understand, part of the damages which he awards is awarded for false and malicious statements made by persons unknown to persons unknown upon occasions and at times as to which the only information is that they were subsequent to January 1923. All that is known as to the content of these statements is that they affirmed "a non-existent difference in the quality of the goods." What is supposed to be known as to the special damage, caused is still more difficult to understand. Because, though the learned Judge has disallowed the claims in respect of detention of goods by the Collectors of Customs at Bombay and Calcutta, in respect of the undertaking given by the plaintiff to the High Court of Bombay and in respect of all alleged slanders of goods prior to January, 1923, he has in the end awarded damages on the basis of compensation to the plaintiff for the whole of his loss of profit on all the cases destined for the Indian market which he had contracted to buy, i. e., 666 cases. I am not quite sure what the figure of Rs. 23-8 represents but I think it is intended as the average price which the plaintiff could have obtained if the defendant Company had never in any way claimed that he was infringing their trade mark rights or that their own goods were superior in quality to his.

With all respects to the learned Judge I cannot assent to this way of dealing with the case so far as it is a case of slander of goods. The defendant Company is doubtless responsible for the statements of agent or servant acting "within the scope of his authority" (in the wide sense given to that phrase by modern law) provided that they were false statements made maliciously or without lawful occasion. In the present case malice is on any view an essential and I do not understand how malice or falsity or special damage can be attributed in the vogue.

As the question of special damage enters into questions of limitation I desire to observe that no single one of the slanders referred to in the plaintiff's particulars filed in this Court is within the doctrine of Ratcliffe v. Evans (19). Proper particulars would have shown in each case the loss of the particular customer or dealer to whom they were spoken or some other really specific damage flowing from the publication to him: Leatham v. Rank (20).

The statements here founded on are not statements printed in a newspaper or made at an auction or to the public or to a fluctuating and transitory class of persons unknown to the plaintiff. Neither the nature nor the circumstances in any case require the admission of evidence of general loss of business as the natural and direct result produced. It is in order to get out of the requirement of alleging and proving actual temporal loss with certainty and precision in each case that the plaintiff here claims to multiply by an imaginary number whatever he has proved. In my opinion he has proved no specific instance.

(20) (1912) 57 S. J. 111.

But let it be assumed that he has proved three or six instances all within limitation. One dealer refuses to buy, another cancels his purchase, another goes on buying as before. "If the words are uttered to an individual, and repetition is not intended except to a limited extent, general loss of custom cannot ordinarily be a direct and natural result of the limited slander" [cf. Ratcliffe v. Evans (19).] Proof of a conspiracy to slander the plaintiff's goods, proof of twenty slanders part of a course of conduct, proof of orders to a group of servants to go out uttering slanders throughout a market—this might bring a case to the same level as a case of publication in a newspaper and require the Court as a matter of common sense to let in evidence of general loss of business. But where is the necessary proof? The case is not a case of conspiracy or illegal combination as learned Counsel for the plaintiff expressly concedes. If the number of specific instances proved does not show slander broadcast what is the evidence to contradict the evidence of Abbott and of Selfe? Is it the evidence of the dismissed servant Carr? or Jawar's evidence—not put to Carr of what Carr said to him? Carr's evidence in cross-examination is that practically it was left to them to do what they liked so long as they did nothing wrong. He does also say that he was told to tell the dealers that the plaintiff's goods were old stock from the army and were inferior in quality. This last element does not appear in his statement as to what he actually said to the dealers. It seems, however, highly reasonable to suppose that if the defendants Company were selling fresh stock from England with a superior form of protection from the weather and were asking Rs. 36 per thousand they would represent to dealers that these goods were better than the plaintiff's, who charged a bare three-quarters of their price. Otherwise they could hardly hope to sell their cigarettes at all. I pass over the statements of the plaintiff to the customs on the question of duty. That the question is one of opinion is clear enough. Sheriar says he gave some of plaintiff's cigarettes to two or three customers to test them and that he relied on their opinion and his own also. He does not smoke himself but he did not think there was any difference between plaintiff's and defendant's cigarettes. He would not pay the same price for goods two years old as for fresh goods. Carr says the plaintiff's cigarettes were absolutely sound and marketable when they first came to Bombay. Khodadad says the quality was equal. Das says he had no complaints. Bonnan Sheriar says they were fresh goods and saleable and he had no complaints. Kali Pada did not compare them with the defendant's but says they were of good quality and condition and sold easily. Chakrabarti says some customers would choose the one and some the other. The assistant from Samuel Fitze & Company says they thought the plaintiff's goods to be sound in condition and quality and when they sold they had no complaints. Jawar who says he is an expert asked how the plaintiff's goods compared with the defendants' replied "Not much difference" and "Practically the same." It was put to Mr. Abbott in cross-examination that at the previous trial an experienced dealer gave evidence that the plaintiff's cigarettes were the better. He says it is a question of opinion and that ordinarily dealers and smokers would not detect the difference at once. His letter to London on 10th May, 1921, said the plaintiff's goods were in surprisingly good condition but "they smoke rather nastily in our opinion." On this evidence I fail to see why a claim that the fresher and dearer goods were better should not come within the principle that trade competition is no wrong or why malice should be imputed to the defendant Company's servants for their efforts to persuade dealers that their article was superior: White v. Mellin (21) and Hubbuck & Sons v. Wilkinson Heywood & Clark (22). In "slander of goods" the burden of proof of falsity is on the plaintiff and, in my opinion, he fails to prove this statement to be false.

In these circumstances I do not propose to discuss the question of limitation as to this head of claim but, in my opinion, s. 24 and Art. 36 give the plaintiff two years from the accrual of special damage.

In my judgment this appeal should be allowed. Treating this suit as an application in Suit No. 1610 of 1922 for an inquiry as to the sum to which the plaintiff is entitled as damages for loss caused to him by the injunction granted therein on 11th May, 1922, we should order that such inquiry be held in the said suit by the Official Referee and direct that in ascertaining the said sum the Official Referee do not include any loss accruing to the plaintiff by reason of the cancellation of the contracts referred to in the plaintiff's letters of 17th May, 1922, and 6th June, 1922, to Messrs. Venis & Co. Quoad ultra the suit should be dismissed. The plaintiff must pay to the defendant Company (1) their costs of this appeal and also (2) their costs of the suit before the learned Judge less a sum of Rs. 300 which we assess as the reasonable costs of an application for an inquiry as to damages.

It is desirable to make clear that except for the direction just mentioned as to the cancelled contracts the question of the amount of damage caused by the injunction is at large. The figure of Rs. 238 mentioned by the learned Judge was arrived at on a footing which is not consistent with our decision and the Official Referee will be in no way bound by it.

The inquiry should be treated as an urgent reference.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal against a judgment delivered by my learned brother Mr. Justice Pearson on the 25th January, 1926, by which he held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages from the defendant Company on account of certain wrongful and malicious acts alleged to have been done by the latter.

The facts giving rise to the litigation, out of which the present appeal has arisen, are to be found, among other things, in Ex. DD, being the judgments delivered, in a previous litigation between the parties, by Mr. Justice Pearson on the 18th July, 1922, by the late Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Richardson on the 10th April, 1923, and by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the 13th May, 1924. It will, therefore, and also in view of the judgment just delivered by my Lord, not be necessary for me to state in detail herein the facts involved in the present appeal, except in so far as may be necessary.

In the action in which the said judgments were pronounced, the present appellants sought to restrain the plaintiff from selling in India a well-known brand of cigarettes, namely "Wills' Gold Flakes" which, for many years, they alone, as assignees of the trade-mark and goodwill for India, had been importing into and selling in India. It appeared that the present plaintiff having bought as surplus War stock, over 21 millions of the said cigarettes cheaply in England from purchasers from the manufacturers (who had granted to the present appellants the sale rights for India) was able to undersell in India the present appellants. It was held in that litigation that the sale by the present plaintiff in India of the said cigarettes involved no breach of contract, misrepresentation, or infringement of the rights of the present appellants, and that it had not been shown that the latter had acquired any independent reputation as importers of the said cigarettes. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held confirming the judgments delivered in this Court that the present appellants' suit was not maintainable. [See Imperial Tobacco Co. of India, Ltd. v. Albert Bonnan and Bonnan & Co. (23).]

On the 28th, February, 1922, and on the 8th March, 1922, the first lot of the plaintiff's goods arrived in Bombay and Calcutta respectively and he sold certain cases to dealers. Thereupon the present appellants who had, up to then, exclusive rights of selling the said cigarettes in India, applied to the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta for orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods, on the ground, among others, that having regard to the trade history of the appellants' cigarettes and the acquisition by them, as purchasers of the goodwill in India of the business with which the trade-mark "Wills' Gold Flakes" was associated, the importation of the said cigarettes by the plaintiff (who was not one of the appellants' customers) infringed their trade mark. The plaintiff's goods were accordingly detained by the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta. This was done in order to allow the appellants an opportunity of having the matter adjudicated upon in the Civil Courts.

Thereafter, two suits, one in this Court and another in the Bombay High Court were filed on the 11th and 22nd days of May, 1922, respectively. On the first mentioned date, application having been made by the appellants an interim injunction was issued by this Court restraining the plaintiff, his servants and agents, from disposing of certain cases of cigarettes then lying with the Customs Authorities in Calcutta. The application for injunction was disposed of by this Court in the presence of both sides on the 8th June, 1922, when, it appearing that the present plaintiff had placed a sum in fixed deposit of Rs. 20,000 into the Alliance Bank of Simla, it was ordered that the interim injunction referred to above should stand dissolved. It was stated in the order of the 8th June that the present plaintiff's claim for damages, if any, owing to the interim injunction having been granted was reserved. In the Bombay suit the present appellants gave notice of motion on the 23rd May, 1922, for a similar injunction against the present plaintiff. The application in the Bombay Court was disposed of on the 19th June, 1922, when the present plaintiff, who was the defendant, having given an undertaking not to dispose of or in any way deal with the cigarettes then in Bombay or to arrive in Bombay, the application stood over by consent of parties till the hearing of the suit. Subsequently, by an order of the 2nd August, 1922, the then defendant's undertaking of the 19th June, 1922, was vacated, as he agreed to keep an account of the sale of the contents of the cases of cigarettes mentioned in the plaint in the Bombay suit, without prejudice to the rights of the defendant, if any, to claim damages consequential on the order of the 19th June, 1922.

On the 21st January, 1925, the plaint in the present suit was put on the file and in it the present respondent complained that certain acts which had been done by the present appellants were malicious and wrongful and he accordingly claimed damages for seven and half lacs of rupees. The acts complained of are referred to in paras. 6 to 11 of the plaint, and they may be classified as follows:—

(a) Wrongfully and maliciously applying to the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta and obtaining from them orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods.

(b) Wrongfully and maliciously instituting and prosecuting suits against the plaintiff in the High Courts in Bombay and Calcutta,

(c) Wrongfully and maliciously obtaining an injunction against the plaintiff from this Court as referred to above.

(d) Wrongfully and maliciously giving notice of motion for an injunction against the plaintiff in the Bombay High Court in which proceeding the plaintiff was made to give an undertaking on the 19th June, 1922.

(e) Wrongfully and maliciously publishing various statements slandering the plaintiff's goods.

Mr. Justice Pearson held that the conduct of the appellants in regard to the proceedings before the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta was malicious and without reasonable and probable cause. He also held that in filing the two suits in Bombay and Calcutta and in proceeding with them as they did, the appellants acted maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. He found that the appellants did make and circulate statements slandering the plaintiff's goods, and he finally came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had suffered damages by reason of the said acts on the part of the appellants. According to Mr. Justice Pearson, the plaintiff started off very well in Bombay in the matter of the sale of his cigarettes, but instead of finding a fair field for his goods, he found himself faced with obstruction after obstruction, maliciously raised by the appellants' courses of delay, disparagement of his goods, assertion of unfounded rights—all of which interfered with the plaintiff's right to trade in his goods in the ordinary way. In short, Mr. Justice Pearson came to the conclusion that in this case the appellants had acted mala fide and with ulterior motive from beginning to end. He, therefore, directed an enquiry for ascertainment of damages sustained by the plaintiff under heads Nos. 1 to 5, both inclusive, in Schedule A to the plaint on the basis of an uniform rate of Rs. 23-8 per thousand cigarettes.

The appellants' case has been elaborately argued and I propose to examine whether the plaintiff's said claims for damages are sustainable in law or on facts. To start with it appears that in respect of claim (a), the orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods in Bombay and Calcutta by the Collectors of Customs was made under the provisions of the Sea Customs Act (Act VIII of 1878) under the usual indemnity from the appellants on the ground that the goods which the plaintiff had imported into India bore a counterfeit trade mark. Whether they bore a counterfeit trade mark or not, it is quite clear that the provisions under the Sea Customs Act are in some cases to be read with the provisions of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act (Act IV of 1889) relating to false trade description and that they are intended not only for the protection of manufacturers and merchants against the piracy of their marks, but also for the protection of the public against the supply of goods of an inferior or unknown quality under cover of a well-known brand. As I read the provisions of the Sea Customs Act, as amended by the Merchandise Marks Act, it is clear that although ordinarily action thereunder is taken upon information received from the manufacturer or merchant aggrieved; there is nothing to prevent the Customs Officers from acting upon their own initiative. The sections of the Sea Customs Act which were referred to at the hearing before us are ss. 18 and 19-A. The appellants might have taken an exaggerated view of their rights, but it appears that the Customs Officers really proceeded in this matter to act in accordance with the instructions for the observance of Customs Officers appearing on page 11 of the Merchandise Marks Manual (1925) issued by the Government of India. Be that as it may, what happened in this case was this. The appellants were and are the successors in India of Messrs. Wills, who were the original manufacturers of Wills' Gold Flake cigarettes. The business of Messrs. Wills in course of time changed hands and was eventually acquired by the British American Tobacco Co., Ltd., who became the owners of the several trade marks of Messrs. Wills' several brands of cigarettes, including the trade mark of the Gold Flake cigarettes. In India, the sale of Gold Flake cigarettes was in the hands of the British American Tobacco Co. (India) Ltd. The two Companies were separate and distinct, and the last named Company acted as sellers and distributors in India of the products of the former Company. The appellants entered into an arrangement with the two Companies referred to above sometime in 1910, the effect of which was that the appellants thenceforward carried on business in India as sellers and distributors of the goods manufactured by the British American Tobacco

Co. Ltd., including the Gold Flake cigarettes, in place of the British American Tobacco Co. (India) Ltd.. They (the appellants) really purchased the Indian business. A formal assignment of the goodwill of the business carried on in India by the first-named Company with all trade marks used in the said business, including the trade mark relating to Gold Flake cigarettes was executed in favour of the appellants on the 11th April, 1922, and it was completed sometime in May, 1922. It appears on the evidence that at first the appellants were doubtful as to whether they were at all entitled to apply to the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta for orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods; but shortly before the 12th April, 1922, they received certain advice from their Solicitor in London to the effect that the plaintiff's goods, labelled as they were, were infringements of the trade mark of the Gold Flake cigarettes and, therefore, a violation of the right which was in the appellants. There are two telegrams from the London Solicitor Mr. Macnaghten; one is dated the 4th April, 1922, and the other dated the 10th April, 1922. This last telegram was not admitted in evidence in the Court of first instance. The reasons for the exclusion of this telegram from the record do not appear on the record itself and are not appreciated. Obviously it was a material document and, in my opinion, should have been admitted in evidence. It has been used before us at the hearing of this appeal and it should be on the record. It appears from the two telegrams referred to above that it was thought by the professional advisers in London of the defendant Company, i. e., by experts in trade mark law that there were substantial grounds for approaching the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta with a request for detention of the plaintiff's goods. The appellants then proceeded to take action.

The grounds urged in the requests made to the Collectors of Customs in Calcutta and Bombay are set out on pages 123 and 140 in Part II, Vol. I of the Paper-Book and they are as follows:—

"We consider the importation of the above goods into India as an infringement of our trade mark in W. D. & H. O. Wills' brand of Gold Flake cigarettes. We have been manufacturing and marketing the brand for many years past and have lying and well-established 'sole right to the mark in India. Our packet label bears the words, 'this label is issued by the Imperial Tobacco Co. of India, Ltd., successors in India to W. D. & H. O. Wills.'" On these applications being made, orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods were passed by the Customs Authorities. The goods in Bombay were released from detention by the Collector on the 5th May, 1922, the detention having been for a very brief period, i. e., from the 1st May, 1922. As regards the goods in Calcutta, they were detained from the 12th April, 1922, to the 19th June, 1922, when the order for release was passed by Mr. Lloyd, Collector of Customs in Calcutta. The detention in Calcutta from the 11th May was really by virtue of the injunction issued by this Court.

Now the first question which arises for consideration is whether the present plaintiff has, on the evidence before us, substantiated his contention that the statements made to the two Collectors of Customs were untrue in fact, that the said statements were made maliciously, and, without reasonable and probable cause and that he has suffered special damage thereby [see the case of Nemi Chand v. Wallace (24).] From what has been stated above, in my opinion, there cannot be any doubt that the appellants did really believe in what they had stated to the Customs Authorities and that there was no mis-statement of fact on their part. On the evidence on record, both oral and documentary, I am not prepared to say that the appellants had made statements to the Collectors of Customs which were untrue in fact and untrue to their knowledge, or had acted maliciously in the proceedings before the said Collectors. The plaintiff has, in my opinion, entirely failed to bring his case within the rule laid down by the Court of Appeal in the case of Nemi Chand v. Wallace (24). So much on the evidence; but the plaintiff's claim on this head is bound to fail for another reason, namely, that it is, having regard to the dates set out above, barred by limitation under Art. 36 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act, as was indeed held by the learned Judge at the bottom of page 528 of the Paper Book, Part I. It was urged that Art. 49 applied to this part of the plaintiff's case. In my opinion, Art. 49 does not apply at all; the detention of the plaintiff's goods was not by the appellants.

I will now deal with claim (e), which is referred to in para. 11 of the plaint, which runs as follows: "The defendant Company through its officers, servants and agents throughout India rumoured and caused to be rumoured and circulated (statements) to the effect that the Gold Flake cigarettes imported by the plaintiff were inferior in quality and otherwise than they were represented to be, and that they were otherwise than in a sound and good and merchantable condition and that they were inferior to those sold by the defendant Company, that they were not genuine Gold Flake cigarettes and that the plaintiff had no right to import and sell them as such." The learned Judge's finding on this point is summed up in the following words: "Undoubtedly the Company's servants were going round warning dealers that they would not be responsible for the plaintiff's goods. There is no harm in that and they could properly employ the whole of their organization in broadcasting it to the dealers. There seems to be no doubt, however, that they went further and wrongly impressed on dealers a non-existent difference in the quality of the goods, and also made full use of the litigation in Bombay and Calcutta with its attendant threat of trouble to others as an obstruction to the plaintiff and as a deterrent. That is a clear impression which I retain after hearing the evidence." The learned Judge further added, in dealing with the question of limitation raised on behalf of the defendant Company as an answer to this part of the plaintiff's claim, the following,—"In so far as the cause of action may be slander of title or slander of goods the limitation would be either one year under Art. 25 or two years under Art. 36: the latter is, in my opinion, applicable in the circumstances for I think the action would be on the case. Nevertheless I think it is a fair inference to draw from the evidence that the statements alleged and complained of, continued, to the extent already mentioned, to be repeated within two years before suit, particularly having regard to the continuance of the previous suits which throughout were designed as a disparagement of the plaintiff's goods and an obstruction to the unfettered exercise of his rights as a trader, of which I have no doubt the Company made the fullest use the whole time the litigation lasted, and whenever occasion so required. I am not prepared to say that in any view of the matter the Company is excused by the principle that a trader is entitled to protect his own property and his own interests because I think in this case there was mala fides and ulterior motive from the beginning until the end." It will be seen from the above that the learned Judge laid particular stress on the pendency of the previous suits for founding his conclusion that slander of the plaintiff's goods had been going on.

Now, in an action for damages for slander of goods the precise words complained of must be set out in the statement of claim; there are many authorities that it is not sufficient to allege that the slanderer used such and such words or to that effect. Has this rule been complied with in the present instance by the plaintiff? In my opinion para. 11 of the plaint offends in every way against this cardinal rule; and it is surprising that the defendant Company should not have insisted in the Court of first instance on full and sufficient particulars being furnished to them before the pleadings were closed, in respect of the matters alleged or suggested in para. 11 of the plaint. However, at the hearing before us, learned Counsel on behalf of the plaintiff has furnished us with a number of particulars of the statements complained of and we have been taken through them.

It is said that Mr. Selfe, who was employed in the Bombay office of the defendant Company stated to certain people in Bombay, whose names are given, that the plaintiff's cigarettes were inferior in quality to the defendant Company's cigarettes, that they were "kharab" that they were old and not fit for sale. It is further said that Mr. Abbott had also used similar language in respect of the plaintiff's cigarettes. Now all this is said to have taken place between August and May 1922. Between March or April and August 1922 Mr. Carr, who was employed in the Bombay office, is alleged to have stated to a dealer named Khodadad that the plaintiff's goods were not genuine and that if Khodadad dealt in the same, he would suffer loss. It is further alleged that in July, 1922, one Akhil Paul, a servant of the appellants, stated to one Kalipada

Roy that the plaintiff's cigarettes had been purchased at auction and that if he sold them he would incur loss. There is also the statement alleged to have been made to one Naren Chakrabutty that the plaintiff's cigarettes were not genuine and that he would have difficulty in selling them. Now, the written instructions to the Bombay office of the defendant Company which were given on the 23rd March, 1922, and which must have been present in the minds of the officers in the employ of the appellants (and these must have been the instructions given in the Calcutta office) were as follows:—"Please warn all dealers that these goods are not put on the market by us and that we cannot accept responsibility in any way whatsoever for goods which do not bear our name." Abbott has given evidence in this case and he has categorically denied that in talking to the witness, Sheriar about the plaintiff's cigarettes he had said anything at any time beyond this, namely, that the plaintiff's cigarettes were not the defendant Company's and that the defendant Company would not be responsible for them. Mr. Selfe has also given evidence and like Mr. Abbott he has also categorically denied that he ever made any remarks about other people's goods. Mr. Milles stated also that all that he did was to warn dealers that the goods were not of the defendant Company's manufacture and that the latter did not accept any responsibility for them. The conversations alleged to have taken place between the witness Carr and Khodadad have not been relied upon by the learned Judge and it is, therefore, unnecessary for me to refer to them. As regards the statements said to have been made to Kalipada Roy and Naren Chakrabutty, I see no reason why I should not accept the evidence of Akhil Paul and Mr. Ryan. I find that the plaintiff has not made out any case as regards the said alleged statements. Nor do I think that the plaintiff has made out any case about the alleged conversations between Carr and Rustom. The other statements complained of, were in the written complaints to the Collectors of Customs in Calcutta and Bombay, the letter to Messrs. Samuel Fitz & Co. dated the 19th April, 1922, and the letters to the Imperial Bank of India, Calcutta and Bombay, dated the 1st and 14th January, 1924, respectively. In these cases also the plaintiff has not made out any case at all. Now, to succeed in an action for slander of goods, the plaintiff must allege and prove (1) that the statement complained of was made of and concerning his goods; (2) that it was false; (3) that it was published maliciously, i. e., with the intention of injuring him and (4) that he has suffered special damage thereby. A trader is entitled to commend his own goods and state that they are better than the goods of another and if he does so, no action will lie against him, whatever damage may ensue from such statement [see White v. Mellin (21)]. It is otherwise where a trader does not limit himself to a comparison of his goods with those manufactured by another trader and a mere statement that they are inferior in quality to his own, but goes further and makes an untrue statement of fact about his rival's goods—for example, where he states that they are rotten or unmerchantable. In such a case like this, an action on the case will lie, provided it can be proved that such statement was published maliciously and that special damage has ensued [see Lyne v. Nicholls (25)]. It is not malice if the object of the trader is to push his own business. To make the act malicious it must be done with the direct object of injuring the other person's business. Therefore, the mere fact that it would injure that other person's business is no evidence of malice [see Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd v. Maison Talbot (26)]. This being the state of the authorities, I have carefully scrutinized the evidence of Sherier and Khodadad and of the other witnesses on the side of the plaintiff taken along with the evidence of the officers of the defendant Company and I have come to the conclusion that no statements in slander of the plaintiff's goods were made by the officers of the defendant Company which would give rise to a cause of action. I am not unmindful that it was alleged on the plaintiff's side that the plaintiff's goods were said to have been described by Mr. Selfe and officer of the defendant Company, on one occasion as being 'kharab' or unmerchantable; but I am unable to place any reliance on that piece of evidence. In what context was the word used, if used at all? I have grave doubts if it was at all used. The learned Judge says that the statements alleged and complained of continued to be repeated within two years before suit. Where is the evidence in support of this statement? It is possible and indeed likely that the appellant gave instructions to their officers to see that their rights are protected so far as the market was concerned; but I do not find on the evidence that lying reports about the plaintiff's goods were made by the Company's officers or were authorised by them, if ever made or that they were repeated from time to time within two years before suit. Therefore, on the facts I must hold that the plaintiff has failed to make out any case whatsoever in support of his claim (e), as set out in para. 11 of the plaint. His claim for damages must also be held to be barred under s. 24 and Art. 36 of the Limitation Act.

I now proceed to consider the case set up by the plaintiff under claim (b), as set out above, viz., wrongfully and maliciously instituting suits against the plaintiff in the High Courts in Bombay and Calcutta. On behalf of the appellant it has been contended before us on the authority of the case of Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (9) that no action would lie against the defendant Company for having brought the suits in the Bombay High Court and in this Court referred to above. Brett, M. R., in that case observed as follows:—"I entirely agree that even although civil proceedings are taken falsely and maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, nevertheless no action will lie in respect of them, unless they produce some damage of which the law will take notice."

"I start with this, that at the present day the bringing of an action under our present rules of procedure, and with the consequences attaching under our present law, although the action is brought falsely and maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, and whatever may be the allegations contained in the pleadings, will not furnish a ground for a subsequent complaint by the person who has been sued, nor support an action on his part for maliciously bringing the first action. To speak broadly, and without travelling into every corner of the law, whenever a man complains before a Court of Justice of the false and malicious legal proceedings of another, his complaint, in order to give a good and substantial cause of action, must show that the false and malicious legal proceedings have been accompanied by damage express or implied

The reason why, to my mind, the bringing of an action under our present rules of procedure and under our present law, even if it is brought without reasonable or probable cause and with malice, gives rise to no ground of complaint, appears to me easily to be seen upon referring to the doctrine laid down by Holt, C. J., in Savile v. Roberts (12). He there said that there were three sorts of damage, any one of which would be sufficient to support an action for malicious prosecution. '(1) The damage to a man's fame, as if the matter whereof he is accused be scandalous. And this was the ground of the case between Sir Andrew Henley and Dr. Burstal: Raym. 180... (2) The second sort of damages, which would support such an action, are such as are done to the person; as where a man is put in danger to lose his life, or limb, or liberty, which has been always allowed a good foundation of such an action..... (3) The third sort of damages, which will support such an action, is damage to a man's property, as where he is forced to expend his money in necessary charges, to acquit himself of the crime of which he is accused, which is the present charge. That a man in such case is put to expenses, is without doubt, which is an injury to his property, and if that injury is done to him maliciously, it is reasonable that he shall have an action to repair himself.' It is clear that Holt, C. J., considered one of these three heads of damage necessary to support an action for malicious prosecution. To apply this test to any action that can be conceived under our present mode of procedure and under our present law, it seems to me that no mere bringing of an action, although it is brought maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, will give rise to an action for malicious prosecution. In no action, at all events in none of the ordinary kind, not even in those based upon fraud where there are scandalous allegations in the pleadings, is damage to a man's fair fame the necessary and natural consequence of bringing the action. Incidentally matters connected with the action, such as the publication of the proceedings in the action, may do a man an injury; but the bringing of the action is of itself no injury to him. When the action is tried in public, his fair fame will be cleared, if it deserves to be cleared: if the action is not tried, his fair fame cannot be assailed in any way by the bringing of the action. Apply the second head of damage, namely, those injuries which are done to the person: the bringing of no action under our present law and under the ordinary rules of procedure will involve as a necessary and natural consequence damage to the person. The third sort of damage, the existence of which will support such an action as this, is damage to a man's property. The same observation applies to this third head of damage. The bringing of an ordinary action does not as a natural or necessary consequence involve any injury to a man's property, for this reason, that the only costs which the law recognises, and for which it will compensate him, are the costs properly incurred in the action itself. For those the successful defendant will have been already compensated, so far as the law chooses to compensate him. If the Judge refuses to give him costs, it is because he does not deserve them: if he deserves them, he will get them in the original action: if he does not deserve them, he ought not to get them in a subsequent action. Therefore, the broad canon is true that in the present day, and according to our present law, the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously, and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause, will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution. 'I do not say that if one travels into the past and looks through the cases cited to us, one will not find scattered observations and even scattered cases which seem to show that in other days, under other systems of procedure and law, in which the consequences of actions were different from those of the present day, it was supposed that there might be some kind of action which, if it were brought maliciously and unreasonably, might subsequently give rise to an action for malicious prosecution. It is unnecessary to say that there could not be an action of that kind in the past, and it is unnecessary to say that there may not be such an action in the future, although it cannot be found at the present day. The Counsel for the plaintiff Company have argued this case with great ability; but they cannot point to a single instance since Westminster Hall began to be the seat of justice in which an ordinary action, similar to the actions of the present day, has been considered to justify a subsequent action on the ground that it was brought maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. And although every Judge of the present day will be swift to do justice and slow to allow himself as to matters of justice to be encumbered with either precedents or technicalities, still every wise Judge who sits to administer justice must feel the greatest respect for the wisdom of the past, and the wisdom of the past presents us with no decisive authority for the broad proposition in its entirety which the Counsel for the plaintiff Company have put forward."

In this case it is contended on behalf of the appellants that when they instituted the suit in this Court and in Bombay in 1922, they had a perfectly genuine and reasonable case which they could present to the Court [see in this connection Imperial Tobacco Co. (Newfoundland) Ltd. v. Duffy (17); and Dunlop Rubber Co. v. Booth & Co. (18)] and it was never suggested at any time that the actions brought by the appellants in this Court and in the Bombay High Court were malicious. It is quite true that the actions did not succeed; but it is contended that mere dismissal of a suit is no evidence whatsoever of there being no reasonable and probable cause for the institution thereof. It is further urged that all that the appellants did was to take steps for the purpose of protecting their trade in which they had been engaged for a number of years and where their cigarettes had acquired an enduring reputation and that in circumstances like these, malice will not be imputed. [see Sorell v. Smith (15)]. On behalf of the plaintiff it has been argued that the right of a defendant to institute a regular suit for compensation after the termination of certain previous proceedings, is clearly recognized in s. 95, sub-s. (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure and that in India the matter is not concluded by the authority of the case of Qurtz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (9). It is not disputed, however, that in such a suit for compensation, one of the ingredients which the plaintiff must prove is malice, in addition to the facts required to be proved by s. 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure [see the case of Nanjappa Chettiar v. Ganapathi Goundan (27)]. In this case, whether the matter is looked at from the point of view indicated in Qurtz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (9) or from that referred to in s. 95, Civil Procedure Code, the present plaintiff must, in my opinion, fail on the facts. On the evidence on record which I have read and re-read, I can find no trace of malice or of want of reasonable and probable cause on the part of the present appellants, in instituting the suits in this Court and in the Bombay High Court. They had received expert professional advice from London that they had a fair case to go to Court with, having regard to the authorities on the subject, and in these circumstances and without more it is difficult to see why the appellants' suits in Bombay and Calcutta should have been described as malicious. On this conclusion it is not necessary for me to refer to the question of limitation; but if I had to pronounce an opinion on the question of limitation, I should be prepared to hold that the plaintiff's claim for damages under this head is barred by Art. 36 of the Limitation Act.

I next come to the question whether the plaintiff has made out his case under claim (d). The facts in connection with this branch of the case have already been set out by me in an earlier portion of this judgment and I need not, therefore, refer to the same here. It appears to me that having regard to the consent order of the 19th June, 1922, in the Bombay suit, and having regard to the undertaking in the Bombay suit, the plaintiff cannot seek any relief in this Court in respect of any claim he may have for damages. Further, if he had any case under this head, it is barred by limitation.

There now remains for me to consider the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to any relief under claim (c). The plaintiff relies upon the case of Bhut Nath Pal Mistry v. Chandra Benode Pal Chowdhury (2). In my opinion that case lays down the proposition that an injunction is in the nature of trespass to property in terms far too broad and I am unable to agree with it. Now, the plaintiff is seeking to recover damages that had accrued to him by reason of the temporary injunction granted at the instance of the appellants in the suit in this Court. In the proceedings in which the temporary injunction was issued, an undertaking was taken from the appellants to compensate the plaintiff for any loss that might arise by reason of the injunction. Such an undertaking is on the authorities to be enforced by an application to the Court which granted the injunction [see Smith v. Day (4)]. In that case Jessel, M. R. observed as follows:—

(27) 12 Ind. Cas. 507; 35 M. 598; 10 M. L. T. 365; (1911) 2 M. W. N. 414; 21 M. L. T. 1052.

"But the Court has a discretion, and before it will grant damages it must be satisfied that the injunction was improperly obtained, and that the defendant reasonably abstained from going on with his building, and that under all the circumstances damages ought to be given. It may happen that an interlocutory injunction is dissolved for delay or some cause which disentitles the plaintiff to an interlocutory injunction, though not to relief at the trial, and then at the trial, a perpetual injunction is granted. The Court in such a case has a discretion whether, under all the circumstances, the defendant ought to have damages in respect of the interlocutory injunction having been improperly granted, though a perpetual injunction is granted at the trial. Then, again, the Court must have regard to the amount of damage; if it be trifling or remote the Court would not be justified in directing an enquiry as to damages, though the injury might not be so remote that an action would not lie. Then again the time at which the application is made is material. Having regard to the decisions, we are not entitled to say that the application for an inquiry must be made either when the injunction is dissolved or at the trial. One of these must be the most proper time. The application may be made when the injunction is dissolved, but if made then it probably will be ordered to stand over till the trial. If made by motion subsequently to the trial, the party moving is subject to some disadvantage; for the application is one which should be made speedily, and not after the Court has forgotten the circumstances." [See also Griffith v. Blake (6).]

It would, therefore, appear, that the enquiry into damages can be and is ordinarily had by means of an application to the Court which originally granted the temporary injunction. In this case, the proceedings, as will be seen from what has been stated above, did not finally terminate until the 13th May, 1924. The present plaint was filed on the 21st January, 1925. It is contended, however, on behalf of the plaintiff that he is not limited to making an application in the suit in which the temporary injunction was granted for enquiry into damages; but that he has an independent right to bring a suit for compensation and that such right exists is clearly recognised by the terms of Art. 42 of the Limitation Act. The procedure on the Original Side for this Court, being what it is, I think the proper course for the plaintiff should have been to make an application to the Court which granted the temporary injunction and ask for an enquiry into damages. The plaintiff, however, has not been guilty of unreasonable delay in coming to this Court with his present plaint and I think, in the circumstances of this case and for the reasons given by the learned Chief Justice the plaintiff in this suit may be treated as an application for enquiry into damages that might have been sustained by the defendant by reason of the temporary injunction issuing from this Court. The result, therefore, is that, in my judgment, on all the claims except claim (c) the plaintiff must fail and that as regards claim (c) there should be an enquiry into damages as indicated above. What the nature of those damages should be has been indicated by the learned Chief Justice and it is not necessary, therefore, for me to refer to it.

I, therefore, agree with the learned Chief Justice as regards the order which he proposes to make.

The house and homestead of an insolvent in which he holds a raiya-interest cannot be sold in insolvency proceedings in view of the provisions of s. 47 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. [p. 299, col. 1.]

Appeal against an order of the Judicial Commissioner, Ranchi, dated the 28th September, 1926.

Mr. Abani Bhusan Mukharji, for the Appellant,

Mr. Bankim Chandra De, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Allanson, J.—This appeal by a creditor is directed against an order of the Judicial Commissioner of Chota Nagpur holding that the house and homestead lands of an insolvent cannot be sold by the Receiver in view of the provisions of ss. 46 and 47 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act. The house and lands are recorded as part of a rai-yati-holding in the Record of Rights and, if the insolvent has a rai-yati right in them, there can be no doubt that they cannot be sold in the insolvency proceedings in view of the provisions of s. 47 of the Act. The difficulty really has arisen because the house is of an unusual size. It would appear that the insolvents were formerly substantial zemindars holding a tenure under the Ramgarh Wards Estate, and the house was built by their ancestors during that period. Since then the tenure has been resumed. A presumption of correctness attaches to the entries in the Record of Rights and no evidence has been placed before us to show that that entry is wrong. Not only are these lands entered as part of a kaimi rai-yati holding but they have since been assessed to rent under s. 85 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act.

It was argued that the lands have now vested in the Receiver, and that s. 47 of the Act would have no application, but the provisions of that section are quite clear, that it is only in certain circumstances which have no application in the present case that the Court can pass any decree or order for the sale of the right of a rai-yat in his holding.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Where a usufructuary mortgagee in spite of a Civil Court decree in his favour and formal delivery of possession in pursuance thereof has not obtained entry of his name in the Revenue Records and actual possession of the share mortgaged, the mortgagor can maintain a suit for profits under s. 108, cl. (15) of the Oudh Rent Act.

Second appeal passed by the District Judge, Gonda, in Rent Appeal No. 71 of 1924, dated the 2nd May, 1927, confirming that of the Court of the Assistant Collector, First Class, Gonda, dated the 30th September, 1924.

Mr. S. N. Roy, for the Appellant.

Mr. Radha Krishna, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is the defendant's appeal from the decree of the District Judge of Gonda, dated the 2nd of May, 1927, affirming the decree of an Assistant Collector of the First Class of the same place, dated the 30th of September, 1926. The suit, out of which this appeal arises, was for the recovery of a share of profits under s. 108, cl. (15), of the Oudh Rent Act, 1886.

In support of the appeal two points were urged: (1) That the plaintiffs had no title to recover the profits in suit because about 15 years ago they made a usufructuary mortgage of their share in favour of one Bhagwat Shukul and (2) that there is no evidence in proof of the collections made by the appellant having been in excess of his own share in the joint estate.

As to the first point, the Courts below have found that the mortgagee in question in spite of a Civil Court decree in his favour about 15 years ago and formal delivery of possession in pursuance thereof never obtained an order of entry of his name in the Revenue Records and is not in possession of the share in question. This being so, the plaintiffs' title remains where it was.

As to the second point, the chief evidence on which the finding of the Courts below as regards the amount of collections rests is the statement of the village Patwari. According to the lower Courts this Patwari is not a very reliable witness but the Courts below have accepted his evidence as enough for the reason that there is no evidence to the contrary. The second ground of attack also fails.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Rajshahi, dated the 12th of September, 1924, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Rajshahi, dated the 28th of June, 1923.

Mr. Sarat Chandra Roy and Babu Krishna Kamal Moitra, for the Appellant.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak, Babus Jatindra Mohan Choudhury and Jatindra Nath Sanyal, for the Respondents.

Babu Biraj Mohan Majumdar, for the Deputy Registrar.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a final decree determining mesne profits. The proceedings followed a decree for possession with mesne profits in favour of the plaintiff and against a very large number of defendants who belong to two classes, viz., the landlord-defendants and the tenant defendants. The plaintiff has appealed, but some of the defendants of the latter class are not before us, one of them not having been made a party to the appeal and three others having died and an application to substitute their heirs in their places not having been allowed as it was filed out of time. The decisions of the Courts below assessing the amount of mesne profits are concurrent.

A preliminary objection has been taken as to the maintainability of the appeal in view of the defect of parties noticed above. This objection will have to be dealt with first.

The claim for mesne profits is one to recover damages for the previous occupation of the land and under the present procedure it can be joined with the action for the recovery of the land. In the present case it was so joined and a decree entitling the plaintiff to mesne profits was passed against all the defendants in the suit. In the proceedings relating to the ascertainment of mesne profits, a certain sum was assessed by the trial Court and the decree passed on the basis of the said assessment has been upheld by the lower Appellate Court. The object of the plaintiff in preferring this appeal is to vary the amount so assessed. His ground is that the assessment has been made on a wrong principle.

An action for mesne profits is in origin an action of trespass. It is, therefore, regulated by these broad principles which apply to and are now well-settled as being applicable to actions for damages against wrong-doers. In such actions joint wrong-doers may be sued jointly or severally.

In Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th Edition, page 206 the principles are stated thus: "Where more than one person is concerned in the commission of a wrong, the person wronged has his remedy against all or any one or more of them at his choice. Every wrong-doer is liable for the whole damage, and it does not matter, whether they acted, as between themselves, as equals, or one of them as agent or servant of another. There are no degrees of responsibility, nothing answering to the distinction in criminal law between principals and accessories. But when the plaintiff in such a case has made his choice, he is concluded by it. After recovering judgment against some or one of the joint authors of a wrong, he cannot sue the other or others for the same matter, even if the judgment in the first action remains unsatisfied. By that judgment the cause of action 'transit in rem judicatum' and is no longer available. The reason of the rule is stated to be that otherwise a vexatious multiplicity of actions would be encouraged." As regards joint torts it is said in Addison's Law of Torts, 8th Edition, page 44; "All who aid or counsel, direct or join in the commission of a tort are joint tortfeasors. 'If divers do a trespass it is joint and several at the will of him to whom the wrong is done', that is to say, he can sue any one or more of them at his election, and those who are sued cannot insist on having the others joined as defendants." In Thurman v. Wild (1) and other cases it was settled that an accord and satisfaction by one wrong-doer for the whole injury done discharges all the wrong-doers. A release, therefore, given of the whole cause of action to one discharges the others, the reason being that the cause of action being one and indivisible having been released, all persons otherwise liable thereto are consequently released [Cocke v. Jennor (2)]. But a covenant or agreement not to sue one of them is no defence to an action against the others [Hutton v. Eyre (3)]. If therefore while purporting to release one tortfeasor it reserves rights against another, it will be construed as a covenant not to sue and not a release [Duck v. Mayeu (4), Rice v. Reed (5)]. The rule for construing such a document was laid down in the case of Price v. Barker (6) and is to the effect that the meaning would turn upon the intention to be gathered as to whether the right against a joint-debtor was intended to be preserved or not. In King v. Hoare (7) Parke, B. authoritatively laid down: "These considerations lead us, quite satisfactorily to our minds, to the conclusion that where judgment has been obtained for a debt, as well as a tort, the right given by the record merges the inferior remedy for the same debt or tort against another party [See also Buckland v. Johnson (8), Brinsmead v. Harrison (9), Kendall v. Hamilton (10).]

Brinsmead v. Harrison (9) settled the point that after recovering judgment against one wrong-doer, a plaintiff cannot sue the other for the same matter, even if the first action remains unsatisfied a proposition which was doubted before them. Though s. 43 of the Indian Contract Act is not perhaps quite clear whether a complete adaptation of the English rule is intended, yet King v. Hoare (7) has been held to apply in this country both in respect of joint debtors and of joint wrong-doers.

If these principles are applied to an action for mesne profits against cotrespassers the position is clear that while it is open to the plaintiff to proceed against one or some or all of several cotrespassers at his own choice, once a decree has been obtained it is the decree in its entirety that may be challenged on appeal and not otherwise; for so long as the decree against some remains a final and operative decree and not subject to an appeal, even though it is not satisfied but is capable of execution, the plaintiff cannot proceed with the suit further and take an appeal as against the others.

The question of the maintainability or otherwise of the appeal may be considered from another point of view, namely, as being dependent upon the question whether there is a right of contribution amongst the defendants inter se because if there is such a right, the decree, on the appeal if it varies that from which the appeal has been preferred will affect the rights and liabilities of those parties who are not before the Court and will produce an inconsistency on the record which is not permitted by law.

No doubt, as a general rule the liability of joint wrong-doers in tort is joint and several, but it is not an inflexible rule which needs no relaxation according to the view that is taken of jointness of the act or acts which constitute the wrong. Mookerjee, J., in an elaborate judgment in the case of Ram Ratan Kapali v. Aswini Kumar Dutt (11), in which he has exhaustively dealt with the question, has observed thus: "It cannot be laid down as an inflexible rule that in every case of tort, the Court is bound to pass a joint decree against the wrong-doers making each jointly and severally liable for the whole amount decreed.....In cases, therefore, in which the controlling general principle, namely, that where acts of several persons by design, or by conduct tantamount to conspiracy, contribute to the commission of a wrong, they are jointly liable, is not applicable, the rule of joint liability also ceases to be applicable." In that case it was held that in respect of mesne profits which accrue during the pendency of a suit for possession, the liability of different tenure-holders of the same degree, and of separate under-tenure-holders of different degrees should be apportioned according to the share of the profits intercepted by each. This decision has been dissented from by Page, J., in the case of Promode Nath Roy v. Secretary of State for India (12). With great respect, however, I venture to think that the judgment of Mookerjee, J. carefully read appears to except from the general rule cases in which the tortfeasors are not really joint and are, therefore, persons to whom the rule does not apply and, in my opinion, therefore, the judgment is unexceptionable. Merryweather v. Nixan (13) was a case in which one S brought an action against two persons for an injury done by them to his reverend estate in a mill, in which was included a count in trover for the machinery belonging to the mill and having recovered £840, he levied the whole upon one of the said two persons, and one of them then sued the other for a contribution of the moiety, as for so much money paid to his use. The plaintiff was nonsuited. Lord Kenyon, C. J., said "that he had never before heard of such an action having been brought, where the former recovery was for a tort: that the distinction was clear between this case and that of a joint judgment against several defendants in an action of assumpsit: and that this decision would not affect cases of indemnity where one man employed another to do acts, not unlawful in themselves, for the purpose of asserting a right." The rule has been modified in collision cases. [The Frankland (14), Austin Friars

Steamship Co. v. Spiller & Bakers Ltd. (15). Relying upon Palmer v. Wick Steam Shipping Co. (16) it has been said in more decisions than one that the rule will not be extended. The rule has been said by very high authority as having been too widely laid down and it has been said that it is to be taken with the qualification that it will hold if the nature of the case is such that the plaintiff must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful Act. [See Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th Edition, page 207, referring to the dicta of Lord Herschell in Palmer v. Wick Steam Shipping Co. (16); Per Bruce, J., in The Englishman and The Australia (17) and Burrows v. Rhodes (18). See also Adamson v. Jarvis (19)].

In this country the doctrine has not been applied in cases of contribution regarding mesne profits where the parties were not wilful tortfeasors, Bishnu Charan Roy v. Bipin Chandra Roy (20) and doubt has been entertained whether it applies to this country at all [Nihal Singh v. Collector of Bulandshahr (21)]. When wrong-doers have acted under a bona fide claim of right and had reason to suppose that they had a right to do what they did, contribution inter se may be allowed [Sreeputty Roy v. Laharam Roy (22); Suput Singh v. Imrit Tewari (23); Kishna Ram v. Rakmini Sewak Singh (24); Mahabir Prasad v. Darbhanga Thakur (25)]. There has been cases in which the liability of co-trespassers for mesne profits has been apportioned where their shares are capable of being determined, e. g.; Makund Singh v. Saraswati Bibi (26).

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that in the present case it has already been found that all the defendants acted in concert and consequently Merryweather v. Nixan (13) should be applied in all its integrity and no question of contribution can possibly arise. In support of this contention reliance has been placed upon certain findings in the judgments declaring the plaintiff's right to khas possession and mesne profits. I have carefully examined these findings but I am unable to hold that they were ever intended to be treated as findings decisive of the question. The question never arose for determination in the suit as it is obviously a question between the defendants inter se and there was no issue raised for its effective determination.

The result then is that the appeal is no longer maintainable. In that view the appellant's contention as to the propriety of the principle on which mesne profits have been calculated need not be considered.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Mortgage—Redemption—Mortgagee's right to compensation for improvements.

A mortgagee in possession is not entitled to claim compensation for value of improvements effected by him on the mortgaged property, unless they are of a permanent character and add to the saleable value of the property. [p. 304, col. 2.]

First appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, First Class, Amritsar, dated the 30th May, 1924.

Lala Badri Dass, R. B., for the Appellants.

Messrs. Dev Raj Sawhney and Bal Kishan, for the Plainiffs-Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the mortgagors for possession by redemption of certain property which had been mortgaged to defendants Nos. 1 and 2, on payment of a sum of Rs. 5,500. The mortgagees were let into possession and the period mentioned in the mortgage deed was three years. The mortgagees were to realise the profits of the mortgaged property and to appropriate it in lieu of interest after paying the Government Revenue.

The date of the mortgage was the 25th of August, 1911, and the present suit was instituted on the 22nd December, 1922. The main defence of the defendants for the purposes of this judgment is to the effect that the mortgagees had not been put into possession of the mortgaged property during the first three years of the mortgage, although they admit that they have received the profits for the first two years. They, therefore, claim profits for one year. They further plead in para. 2 of their written pleas that "with consent of the mortgagors they have effected repairs to a ghair abad well and had got two pipes set up therein at a cost of Rs. 600." They claim this sum for having made improvements upon the property. They further plead that they had planted some orange trees on the land at an expense of about Rs. 600 or Rs. 700 and they ask to be reimbursed for that outlay. They also say that they reclaimed certain banjar land by spending about Rs. 1,000 and claim this sum also from the plaintiff. There were certain other pleas which do not seem to have been pressed and which need not be noticed by the Court. The trial Court decreed the plaintiffs' suit but went on to hold that they must pay, in addition to Rs. 5,500, the mortgage-money, a further sum of Rs. 1,550 being the estimated profits for the year during which possession was withheld from the mortgagees by the mortgagors.

The defendants mortgagees have come up in appeal to this Court challenging that part of the decree of the Court below which has refused to allow them the costs of the alleged improvements and the expense incurred by them in planting orange trees and in reclamation of the land. The plaintiffs have filed a cross-appeal in which they challenge the finding of the Court below as to the sum of Rs. 1,550.

The learned Counsel for the defendants-mortgagees did not seriously press his case as regards the alleged planting of orange trees and the reclamation of banjar land, but he strenuously argued that the mortgagees were entitled to the costs incurred in the so-called improvements, effected by them by executing certain borings in the ghair abad well. It is unfortunate that the contesting defendants' Pleader did not clearly define his position as regards the alleged improvements and has led evidence in a somewhat haphazard manner. At first he put forward the case of the repairs having been effected with the consent of the mortgagors but afterwards goes on to suggest the general plea of improvement in the same paragraph.

In the evidence produced by the defendants, they attempt to make out a case both of consent and of improvement. The trial Court has very properly decided as a fact that no consent by the mortgagors has been established. On the general question of improvement the Court has also decided against the contesting defendants. The Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) does not apply to the Punjab and so we need not consider the provisions of that Act. We are thrown back upon the general principles of law so far as it applies to the question of improvements effected by a mortgagee while in possession. According to the old English authorities a mortgagee was not entitled to be recouped for any improvements that he might make upon the mortgaged property unless he obtained the consent of the mortgagor beforehand. "But the tendency of later decisions appears to be more favourable to the mortgagee in this respect, and it has been laid down that, prima facie a mortgagee who has expended money in improvements is entitled to an inquiry whether the outlay has increased the value of the property and to be allowed such outlay so far as the value is proved to have been increased thereby." Vide Coote on Mortgages, Vol. II, 1924 Edition, page 1225. The leading authority on subject is the well-known case of Shepard v. Jones (1). It lays down that the improvement for which the mortgagee can claim to be compensated at the time of the redemption of his mortgage must be a lasting and permanent improvement. It must have increased the saleable value of the property and it must be a reasonable sum the payment of which would not make the redemption of the mortgage by the mortgagor difficult or impossible. This is nothing but ordinary justice that the increase in the price of the property should not go into the pocket of the mortgagor without his reimbursing the mortgagee whose money was instrumental in raising the price of the property. The law is also very succinctly put by Mr. Fisher in his well-known work on Mortgages, vide paras. 1782 and 1783 of Fisher's Law of Mortgages; see also the cases reported as Nijalingappa Nijappa Halgatti v. Chanabasawa Satavirappa Nesari (2) and Rikhi Kesh v. Jwala Sahai (3). Thus the law is clear and well-settled. Let us apply the law to the proved facts of the case.

Now, there is no evidence on the record to show that the improvement was a lasting one or that it materially increased the saleable value of the property. The alleged improvement, according to the mortgagees consisted of making some holes in the bottom of a ghair abad well. An official was examined as a witness on behalf of the mortgagees. He stated the borings were done in 1917 and that the pipes inserted in those borings worked for four or five years. Now, the suit was brought in 1922, so that the effect of the improvement must have been exhausted before the time the suit was actually filed in Court. After the removal of the pipes or their decay in the ordinary process of nature there would only remain a hole in the soil at the bottom of the well. The walls of this hole in course of time are bound to bank in after the removal or decay of the pipes. We have thus no evidence on the record to show that the improvement was of a lasting nature and such as would increase the value of the property and permanently add to its utility. This being so and the plea of consent being rightly decided by the trial Court against the mortgagees, we think that the decision of the Court below on this point was right and accordingly we dismiss the defendants-mortgagees' appeal with costs.

Now remains the question of the cross-appeal filed by the plaintiffs-mortgagors. We are satisfied on the evidence that the mortgagees were not given possession by the mortgagors during the years 1911, 1912 and 1913. The defendants-mortgagees admit that they received the profits for two years from Nand Singh, one of the Easement—Right of easement against land owned by Government in occupation of lessee—User for 60 years, whether essential.

An easement cannot be claimed against Government unless the claimant has established user for 60 years even though the land over which the easement is claimed is in the occupation of a lessee.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Sultanpur, dated the 21st March, 1927, confirming that of the First Munsif in addition to strength at Sultanpur, dated the 30th October, 1926.

Messrs. A. P. Sen, R. D. Sinha, H. K. Ghosh and G. H. Thomas, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The point raised in this appeal was not one which was considered by the Court below. Briefly the plaintiff's claim now is that he can assert an easement over land which admittedly belongs to Government, although he has not established user for 60 years, on the ground that the land was in the occupation of a lessee. In the lower Courts the plaintiff set up the case that he had been in occupation of the land as a right of way for a period of 60 years but he failed to establish his case. He has, therefore, fallen back on the plea that it was not necessary for him to establish a period of more than 20 years. But it was admitted throughout that the whole mohalla is the property of Government and the Municipal Board is managing this property on behalf of the Secretary of State,

It makes no difference to the ownership of land whether it is or is not leased out to a tenant. It is against the land, and thereby its owner, that a right of easement can be claimed. In my opinion s. 15 of the Easements Act is conclusive on this question and, although I am not aware of any authority on the point other than the decision of a Single Judge of the Allahabad High Court reported as Narain Das v. Behari Kahar (1), I have no hesitation in holding that this suit has been rightly decided by the Courts below and I dismiss the appeal with costs, which will be proportioned between the contesting respondents.

In a suit based on a bond or a mortgage and not on account books, it is not permissible to the Court to draw an adverse inference from the plaintiff's failure to produce his account books, unless the other party has called upon him to produce them and he has refused to comply with the demand. Mr. G. G. Hatwalne, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—I have confined the arguments to grounds Nos. 8, 9 and 10 of the memorandum of appeal as I thought that the trial of the case has been very improper and full of irregularities of procedure.

The suit was based on a mortgage and not on account books but plaintiff desired to tender his relevant account book entries as evidence and, therefore, mentioned them as pieces of evidence in his list of reliance. The defendants taking advantage of this mention applied for inspection of plaintiff's account books with a view to extract their defence out of them. The plaintiff protested but notwithstanding his protest the inspection was allowed and the defendants took inspection and filed an additional written statement admitting some and disputing certain other items entered in the books. But they did not make their defence intelligible by filing extracts of the relevant entries to which the same related.

It was the duty of the Court to examine the defendants further as regards the disputed items and call upon them to produce extracts of accounts on which they relied in support of their contention and then ask the plaintiff to admit or deny the defendants' assertions and to produce such extracts of accounts as may be necessary. The procedure laid down for discovery of documents was followed but only partially. Nobody seems to have also cared to look into the provisions of s. 163 of the Evidence Act and see for himself whether in the circumstances of this case it has any application. Under that section it was the plaintiff's duty to have required the defendants, who had taken inspection, to tender the account books as evidence of both parties. Having taken inspection of plaintiff's books of account the defendants took the risk of making them evidence of both parties in the case. In fact they needed no further proof and were admissible and should have been admitted in toto: cf. Mahomed Khan v. Abdul Rahman (1) and Rajeswari Kuar v. Rai Bal Krishan (2). Failure on his part to avail himself of this privilege has landed the plaintiff into a difficulty and has entailed a dismissal of his claim.

Then again, even though the plaintiff pointed out the omission of the Court below to examine him in answer to the defendants' additional rejoinder filed after taking inspection of plaintiff's books of account, the Court below failed to rectify its own mistake; and tried to technically shift the error on to the shoulders of the plaintiff. This has naturally ended in a disaster to the plaintiff's cause. The Court ought to have re-opened the case, and examined the parties for focussing the points of controversy between them and given them opportunity to substantiate their respective cases.

Then a third defect of procedure which I think is very flagrant was to draw an adverse inference against the plaintiff for non-production of his account books, even though he sued upon a bond or mortgage and not on the account books. Such an inference is not permissible unless the other party has called upon the plaintiff to produce such documents and the latter has failed to comply with the demand. Here he had complied with the demand of the defendants and produced his account books for their inspection and they had in fact taken the inspection and "extracted" their "defence out of them". It is urged by plaintiff that the defendants have taken full notes or extracts of the entries relating to their dealings with the plaintiff but have kept them back. I have only to draw the lower Court's attention to the observations of their Lordships quoted in Mulla's Civil Procedure Code, 8th Edition at page 527 under the heading "Non-disclosure of documents—Presumption". The appellant has produced some extracts of his accounts in this Court. They have been placed on record. They will have to be compared with the originals and perhaps supplemented; the defendants will also have to be called upon to say what they may choose to say as regards their relevancy and genuineness if they challenge it. If they persist in denying the debit items, the plaintiff must be given the chance of corroborating them by the evidence of persons who know anything about them. As held in Rajeswari Kuar v. Rai Bal Krishan (2) " * * * it would be a monstrous thing if the party sued were allowed to call for the accounts of the plaintiff and extract from them just such items as proved matters of defence * * * and were not to allow those items which make in favour of the plaintiff. The High Court held that the books must be admitted in toto. Their Lordships think the High Court were entirely right * * *"

I do not think it will serve any purpose to keep the case pending on my file and call for findings, as the defects in the procedure which the Court below is ordered to remedy are such as necessitate further pleadings and trial. Fresh pleadings and issues will have to be recorded and framed; it is, therefore, desirable to re-open Jagadeo Singh v. Ali Hammad (1), applied.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Cawnpore.

Mr. S. N. Seth, for the Appellants.

Mr. U. S. Bajpai, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—I have considered the ruling in the case of Jagadeo Singh v. Ali Hammad (1) and think that it has been rightly applied to the circumstances of the present case by the learned District Judge of the lower Appellate Court. The suit was brought by an occupancy tenant against zemindars of the village for their ejectment on the allegation that they were his sub-tenants. The Assistant Collector took the view which would suggest itself to most men that if the landlord took possession, he ejected the occupancy tenant, and the tenant was bound to sue for ejectment under s. 79 of the Tenancy Act (II of 1901) which permits of a very short period of limitation. In the present case, however, the occupancy tenant accepted the landlords, who were squatters as his sub-tenants and sued under s. 58 of the Tenancy Act for their ejectment. Having regard to the view taken by this Court in the ruling quoted above, I am of opinion that the occupancy tenant was at liberty to take such action. The landlords did not state in their written statement that they had unlawfully ejected the plaintiff. They simply put forward such a case as a supposition that if the landlords are in possession, the tenant should be considered to have been ejected unlawfully. It may be repeated that the defendants did not put forward any case of having ejected the plaintiff unlawfully. Their main claim was that they were zemindars of the village and khudkasht cultivators of the land. The Assistant Collector dismissed the suit. There was an appeal by the plaintiff. At first sight it may be thought that no appeal lay to the Civil Court. The defendants, however, claimed to be zemindars, and khudkasht cultivators of the land, and as they put forward a claim to proprietary title as against the allegation of sub-tenancy put forward by the plaintiff, a question of proprietary title was raised, and the appeal did lie to the District Court.

It is true that a contract of sub-tenancy between the plaintiff and the defendants was not proved. It appears to be the law however, as understood in this Court, that an occupancy tenant was at liberty to treat a squatter as a sub-tenant and sue him as such. The fact that the squatter happened to be a landlord would not make any difference in my opinion. A landlord can be the landlord of the tenant and may recover rent from him, but at the same he may become a sub-tenant of the tenant and pay rent to the tenant. What appears to me to have been done in this case is that the landlords colluded with and started cultivation with the sub-tenant of the occupancy land, and, when they were asked to pay the rent, they turned round and claimed to be the khudkasht holders. This is a very insidious method of ejecting an occupancy tenant, and should not be permitted. If the defendants had put forward a plea of having unlawfully and forcibly ejected the plaintiff, and had proved such a plea, different circumstances would have arisen, and the decision may have been different. On the pleadings I am of opinion that the lower Appellate Court was correct. I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Income Tax Act (XI of 1922), s. 10 (ix)—Agreement for payment of share of profits without liability for losses—Construction—Payment out of profits—Liability to be deducted—Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 239.

A number of persons entered into an agreement with another by which each of them was to have a certain share in the profits of the business conducted by the latter when ascertained at the end of the two years during which it was to be in force, without any liability in case of loss. The complete control of the business was retained by the person in whose favour the agreement was executed and he contributed the whole capital and was also to have the power of altering the shares:

Held, (1) that the transaction was not a partnership agreement; [p. 308, col. 2.]

(2) that the payments made to them out of the profits could not be deemed to be expenditure incurred solely for the purpose of earning such profits under s. 10 of the Income Tax Act and were not liable to be deducted for purposes of assessment of income-tax. [p. 308, col. 2; p. 309, col. 1.]

Case stated under s. 66 (2) Act XI of 1922 by the Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras, for the decision of the High Court on the following questions:—

1. "Whether in the circumstances of this case there was a genuine and valid partnership.

2. "If the answer to the first question is that there is no partnership, was the Income-tax Officer right in refusing to deduct from the assessable income the portion of the profits which was to be paid to the employees as wages."

Mr. M. Patanjali Sastri, for the Referring Officer.

The Advocate General and Mr. E. Vinayaka Rao, for the Assessee.

JUDGMENT.

Phillips, Offg. C. J.—The first question referred is "whether there was a genuine and valid partnership." This depends upon the construction of the agreement dated the 11th of April, 1922, executed by 33 persons in favour of the petitioner. The petitioner has been treated as the sole proprietor of his firm and been assessed accordingly, and he contends that these 33 persons who have executed the agreement of April 1922 (Ex. A.) are his partners in the business. The Commissioner has found that this agreement does not constitute a partnership agreement and we entirely agree. Apparently there is a provision that each of the executants is to have a certain share in the profits of the business when ascertained at the end of the two years during which it is to be in force. No provision is made for their liability in case of loss and the complete control of the business is retained by Muhammad Kassim, who contributed the whole capital. Not only is he to have the control of the business but even persons holding power-of-attorney from him are to have the same power. The executants agree to be bound by Muhammad Kassim's orders and the orders of those holding his power-of-attorney and also agree that, if they contravene the provisions of the agreement, they can be dismissed. The proprietor has also the power of altering the shares. On these facts, it is clear that this is not a partnership agreement and that these 33 persons were merely the employees of Muhammad Kassim and were entitled to certain shares in the profits when ascertained at the end of the two years.

The second question runs as follows: "If the answer to the first question is that there is no partnership, was the Income-tax Officer right in refusing to deduct from the assessable income the portion of the profits which was paid to the employees as wages?" The petitioner claims to deduct the shares payable to the employees under s. 10 (ix) of the Indian Income Tax Act, which runs, "any expenditure (not being in the nature of capital expenditure) incurred solely for the purpose of earning such profits or gains." The Income-tax Commissioner has held that it has not been shown that the shares were paid out of the capital in the Madras branches of the petitioner's firm and that there are merely some entries in the accounts of the head office at Klang in the Federated Malay States. Apart from this, we think it is clear that this expenditure does not come within the meaning of s. 10 (ix). Such expenditure is to be set off against the profits earned in the year and it must be incurred "solely for the purpose of earning such profits or gains." It is possible to say that payments out of profits really constitute expenditure incurred solely for the purpose of earning such profits? The amount of the expenditure depends on the amount of the profits and, consequently, it is impossible to hold that it was expenditure incurred solely for the purpose of earning those profits.

It is contended by the learned Advocate-General that expenditure must be deemed also to include liability and that, inasmuch as these payments were in the nature of wages of which payment was deferred, they, equally with wages, should be deducted and, to hold otherwise, would produce the anomaly that part of the wages of the firm might be deducted and another part not. This may be anomalous, but it must be remembered that income-tax is calculated on profits and when the tax has been calculated the expenditure on the deferred wages has not been incurred. In fact, it might not even be incurred if the proprietor chose to break the agreement, and certainly it cannot be deemed to be expenditure incurred for the purpose of earning such profits. It is not the expenditure that has led to the profits being earned, but it is a promise that such expenditure would be made in the future that has possibly produced those profits. Rule 3 (1) of Sch. D of the English Income Tax Act, 1918, prescribes that "in computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of any annual interest, or any annuity or other annual payment payable out of the profits or gains." This is very specific and would include the payment out of profits in the present instance. Similarly, if some of the working partners are to get a share in respect of capital put in by them, any payment to them as interest on that capital cannot be deducted under s. 10 (iii) of the Indian Income Tax Act. In view of the language of the section which is very clear, we think it is unnecessary to refer to the cases cited before us and hold that, although it may possibly work hardship in a few cases, the payments to these working partners out of the profits cannot be deducted under s. 10 (ix). Petitioner will pay costs including Counsel's fee of Rs. 250.

Counsel and client—Compromise by Counsel in excess of authority—Restrictions on Counsel's authority not known to other party—Compromise, whether can be set aside.

In a partition suit on the motion of the Counsel of the parties a consent decree was passed fixing the shares of the parties and referring the matter of accounts to a particular person. Subsequently one of the parties applied for vacating the decree alleging that she had given specific instructions to her attorney that certain matters in the case should not be referred. The Court found that the authority of the Counsel was in fact restricted and vacated the decree :

Held, that in view of the fact that the decree was a consent decree involving a reference to a particular individual named by the parties, the Court was justified in re-opening the case when it found that the Counsel had no authority to consent to such a decree, even though the other parties had no notice of the restriction of the Counsel's authority. Neale v. Gordon Lennox (4), followed.

Appeal against an order of Mr. Justice Chotzner, dated the 22nd January, 1927.

Mr. N. C. Chatterjee, for the Appellant.
Messrs. J. N. Majumdar and A. Dutt, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the defendant Chuni Lal Mandal complains of an order made by Mr. Justice Chotzner whereby he set aside an order previously made by him the effect of which was to declare certain shares of parties by consent in a partition suit, to appoint Mr. H. K. Mitter, Barrister at-Law, to partition a certain estate and to direct Mr. H. K. Mitter to take certain accounts and to make certain enquiries.

There were three parties to this suit—two brothers and their mother. The mother is said to be siding with the plaintiff Hira Lal and there appear to have been great many steps in the various disputes in which these parties unfortunately seem to have taken part one against the other. We are not at the moment concerned with anything which happened prior to the date the 15th of December, 1926, when this partition suit came on for hearing. It seems to be a suit in which both parties were liable to account as having various intrusions with the estate left by the father. Defendant Chuni Lal's case was that there was a large quantity of money and valuables in a certain iron safe in the house where Hira Lal and his mother lived and he was desirous of establishing that he was entitled to a certain share of these. In these circumstances, when the suit came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Chotzner, the first thing which happened was that the plaintiff was called on his own behalf as a witness and it was while the plaintiff's evidence was being taken that the incident happened with which we are now concerned.

That the issues which were settled by the learned Judge were fairly complicated there can be no doubt, and the question of the amount of money that was to go to the brothers and to the mother involved accounts and enquiries of a somewhat difficult character. Mr. A. K. Roy who appeared for Chuni Lal took the point that it was waste of time before the learned Judge to go into evidence on the part of the plaintiff or anybody else as to the various details of the accounts as it was quite obvious that in this case there would have to be an order directing the taking of accounts and accordingly he suggested that a Court Officer should be appointed. Somebody else suggested that a particular named Advocate Mr. H. K. Mitter should be appointed, the intention being that he would act as Commissioner of Partition and also as the person to whom the accounts and enquiries should be referred; in other words, he should be appointed as a special referee. In the end what happened was that Mr. J. N. Mitter—the learned Counsel—who appeared for the mother accepted the suggestion that Mr. H. K. Mitter should be appointed and Mr. Mitter was appointed accordingly as appears from the consent decree passed by the Court.

That decree having been made purporting to be a consent decree the lady moved the learned Judge to set that aside. She made the case that she had given certain specific instructions to her attorney who had passed them on to her Counsel. These instructions were directed to the question whether an arbitration or a reference to some person other than an officer of the Court should be agreed to. It may be mentioned that the parties had had previous experience of disputes being referred to arbitration and that it had been disastrous. Her case was that she had given express instructions that certain things were not to be referred in any way and she gave evidence to that effect herself. She filed an affidavit and her Solicitor also filed an affidavit to the effect that he had specific instructions not to consent to any private arbitration or reference to any private individual of matters in dispute in the suit without getting tried by the Court certain questions, and further not to consent until another suit in which his client was the plaintiff was agreed to be tried along with the present suit and all charges made against her by Chuni Lal Mandal in his written statement and by his Counsel in her cross-examination were withdrawn.

Now, it is quite true, as Mr. Chatterjee in a very careful and able argument before us has pointed out that at first sight a good deal of suspicion attaches to a story of this sort. That suspicion is not lessened by the fact that the attorney's affidavit does not give any dates. But the matter does not stop there because the learned Judge at the time when he considered the lady's application to set aside the previous decree had before him Mr. Mitter—the learned Counsel who had consented on behalf of the lady. Mr. Mitter informed the Court from his place at the Bar that in consenting to the terms proposed he was under a misapprehension as to the authority which had been conferred upon him by his client. He said that he was acting under the impression that he had full power to deal with all matters connected with the present litigation but that that impression was mistaken and he had only a restricted authority. In these circumstances, the learned Judge has acted upon the basis that this story of limited authority of the learned Counsel is a true story. I am not prepared to reverse that finding.

The main argument of Mr. Chatterjee before us has been upon the principle which is to be found in certain cases which he has cited, that if special restriction is put upon the general and apparent authority of a Counsel to effect a settlement of matters in a suit, that restriction will not be binding on the other side unless it is communicated to him; in other words, every person is entitled to presume, till it is said to the contrary, that learned Counsel has a general authority. For that proposition certain cases have been cited to us Strauss v. Francis (1) re-affirmed in the case of Welsh v. Roe (2) and the Calcutta case of Askaran Choutmal v. E. I. Ry. Co. (3) decided by my learned brother Mr. Justice Page. On the other hand, we have to consider the case in the House of Lords—the well-known case of Neale v. Gordon Lennox (4).

The first thing we have to ask ourselves here is what was the nature of this order. In so far as it is complained of, it is complained of because it is an order referring to a private individual—an Advocate of this Court—certain matters of account which were involved in the suit itself. It may be perfectly in the right of the learned Judge to refer matters of account to an officer of Court or to somebody else if he thinks it necessary; but in this particular case the reference was, by consent, to a particular named individual, and in these circumstances we have to consider whether the learned Judge was right in being satisfied that the reference in all these matters of account to this particular individual by consent was a reference which should stand after it had been discovered that the learned Counsel who had consented to it had done so contrary to his client's instructions. I do not want to put this case on its facts too high, and I do not think that it can be put as high as the case of Neale v. Gordon Lennox (4) from the point of view of the interest of the lady client. This is not a case in which the aspersions upon the lady's character were a very prominent feature of the suit. It is not a case in which it would be at all unreasonable for the lady to agree to the proposition put forward as, indeed, the learned Judge thinks. But, on the other hand, if it is really true that the lady had objected to these important matters of account (from her point of view) being referred to private arbitration and to a private referee and if that was done by mistake of her Counsel, I am not prepared to hold that the learned Judge was wrong in taking steps to see that the suit should proceed in the ordinary way. If any order of reference can be made without the lady's consent it can still be made notwithstanding that this appeal is dismissed. I say nothing whatever upon that aspect of the case. I do not think that there was any lack of jurisdiction on the part of the learned Judge to make the order which he has made. I do not think that it is open in a case of this sort to the appellant Ohuni Lal to say that he will hold the other parties to this bargain at all costs whether the Court thinks fit to do so or not. In my judgment the position is that the learned Judge has chosen the better course. He dealt with it as a case of the same essential type as Neale v. Gordon Lennox (4), and it certainly is a case in which the order of reference which the Court has made involves that the Court's assistance is being asked in the sense in which Lord Halsbury referred to that matter in his speech in the House of Lords in the case of Neale v. Gordon Lennox (4).

On the whole, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Mitter, J.—I agree.

Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 77—Letter to Agent threatening to sue for price—Notice—Suit for damages against carrier—Limitation—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 31.

A consigned four boxes to B by Railway. Upon the goods reaching the destination B refused to take delivery as one of the boxes was not his and contained goods of a value considerably less than the goods consigned to him and insisted on taking open delivery, which was at first refused. On 16th July, 1923, B wrote a letter to the Agent mentioning the facts and intimating his intention to claim the price. Open delivery was subsequently allowed.

Appeal against a decree of the First Additional District Judge at Barabanki, dated the 18th November, 1926, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Barabanki, dated the 23rd September, 1925.

Dr. J. N. Misra and Mr. Ali Zaheer, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. N. Mukerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts out of which this second appeal arises are as follows. The plaintiff-appellant Bala Prasad is a trader with a fairly large business in the Barabanki District. On the 17th April, 1923, four boxes were consigned to him from Moti Hari Railway Station on the Bengal and North Western Railway to the Barabanki Railway Station which is also on the Bengal and North Western Railway. The consignment arrived somewhere before the 28th of April. The plaintiff consignee, on inspecting the consignment, asserted that although three of the packages were a portion of the consignment, as consigned, the fourth package was not a portion of the consignment and he refused to take ordinary delivery and demanded open delivery. The Station Master under the rules was not competent to give him open delivery and his requests to obtain open delivery were at first of no avail. We find that on the 16th July, 1923, the plaintiff-appellant sent the following letter to the Agent, Bengal and North Western Railway, Gorakhpur and the Secretary of State for India in Council through the Deputy Commissioner of Barabanki (he took the latter course to cover the possibility of the claim being considered to be a claim against a State Railway) and sent copies to other interested parties. The letter is as follows:—

“Sir,

“Moti Hari to Barabanki Parcel Way Bill No. 2854 of 17th April, 1923, four boxes. The above consignment lies undelivered at Barabanki Railway Station till now although about three months have elapsed since it reached here. Instead of four bales of consignment only three are present and the remaining one appears not be addressed to me and changed in transit. I wrote several times to the Traffic Inspector and Station Master asking for delivery of so much of the goods as are mine, after noting its condition and also requested, if they thought proper, an open delivery but no delivery has been made as yet, either open or otherwise, putting me to an enormous loss. The Station Master says that he will not give delivery without instructions from the higher authorities.

“I request you, therefore, to arrange for delivery by the 23rd instant, for I will leave this place on the same date, else I am sorry I will be obliged to claim full price with interest, etc.”

After further correspondence open delivery was taken by the plaintiff-appellant on the 22nd September, 1923. He asserted that when the consignment was opened it was discovered that although three of the boxes were his boxes the fourth box was a box which had never been consigned to him and which contained goods of a value considerably less than the goods which had been consigned to him. He accordingly instituted a suit against the Railway Company on the 22nd September, 1924 (the 20th and 21st September were close holidays) for Rs. 2,191-7-0 damages. The Company contested his claim on a variety of grounds. It asserted that the suit was bad for want of notice under s. 77 Act IX of 1890 and that the suit was also barred by limitation. It was further asserted that the box in question was the box which had been consigned to the plaintiff. Evidence was called on both sides. The learned Subordinate Judge in a very careful and reasoned judgment decided the suit in the plaintiff's favour for Rs. 1,841-8-0 certain interest and costs. The learned Additional District Judge reversed the decree deciding only one point. He found that the suit was bad for want of the issue of a notice under s. 77. The present appeal is filed.

In respect of the ground on which the lower Appellate Court has allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit it is sufficient for us to say that in the first place we are not satisfied that any notice was necessary under the provisions of s. 77. This was clearly a suit against a carrier for compensation for non-delivery of goods. It was by no means certain that there had been any loss, destruction or deterioration. The goods may still be in possession of the Railway Company. But it is sufficient to say that if such a notice were required the letter of the 16th July, 1923, is, in our opinion, an absolutely sufficient notice. We do not agree with the learned Additional District Judge in his views. We do not consider the letter in the least vague and we consider it a perfectly good business notice. We, therefore, reverse the decision of the lower Appellate Court. It is then open to us to return the appeal to the lower Appellate Court for decision of the points which it has not yet decided. We consider, however, that it would be very unfair to the plaintiff-appellant if we took that course. Nearly two years have already elapsed since he instituted the suit and we consider that he is entitled to as speedy a decision as possible. Therefore, as the evidence on the record is sufficient for the purpose we propose under the provision of s. 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure and O. XLI, r. 24 to determine all the points which the lower Court has left undetermined. The first of these points is the point of limitation. We consider that this was a suit against a carrier for compensation for non-delivery of goods. The time from which the period began to run was the period when the goods ought to be delivered. That date we consider to have been the 22nd September, 1923, the date when the Railway at last permitted open delivery. The plaintiff-appellant was entitled to open delivery and was well within his rights in refusing to take anything short of open delivery. We are satisfied upon the evidence that the first opportunity he had of obtaining open delivery was on the 22nd September, 1923, and we, therefore, take the limitation as having commenced from that date. The suit was thus within limitation.

The next question which we have to decide is the question of fact, which was decided by the learned Subordinate Judge in the first and seventh issues. We have very little to say here. We have been through the evidence and through the careful judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge and we are satisfied that the view which he has taken on the evidence is absolutely correct. We agree with him that a box consigned to the plaintiff-appellant never reached him and that the missing box contained the articles which the plaintiff-appellant asserts it did contain. We find that the damages allowed by the learned Subordinate Judge are the correct damages. As a result we allow the appeal, restore the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge as it stands and direct that the Railway Company, pay its own costs and those of the plaintiff-appellant in this Court and the Court below.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge, Amritsar, dated the 25th April, 1923, reversing that of the Munsif, First Class, Amritsar, dated the 2nd November, 1921.

ORDER.

Tek Chand, J.—(June 15, 1927).

—Three persons, Saru Khan, Piru Khan and Amir, descendants of one Hakim, instituted the suit out of which this second appeal arises for possession of land, alleging that the occupancy rights in the land were acquired by their ancestor Hakim and that they were entitled to hold the tenancy, and that the defendants, who are the descendants of Nawab, brother of Hakim, had no right to be in possession of these rights. The suit was decreed in favour of all the three plaintiffs by the trial Court. On appeal by the defendants, the learned District Judge dismissed the suit with costs in both Courts.

Against the appellate decree of the District Judge a second appeal has been preferred to this Court and in the memorandum of appeal Saru Khan, plaintiff No. 1, alone has been shown as the appellant. The contesting defendants Jan

Muhammad and Sheru and Kartar Singh and Sher Singh, who were pro forma defendants, were made respondents. The other two co-plaintiffs, namely, Piru and Amir, were not impleaded as parties to the second appeal. To the memorandum of appeal, however, was added at foot note by Mr. Amar Nath Chopra, the learned Advocate, who had preferred the appeal on behalf of Saru Khan, that the appeal was for the benefit of all the plaintiffs.

On the case coming up for hearing before us to-day Mr. Kishan Dayal for the respondents raised a preliminary objection that it was not competent to Saru Khan to appeal on behalf of all the other co-plaintiffs without making those co-plaintiffs parties to the second appeal as respondents. In reply reliance is placed on O. XLI, r. 4, and it is argued that Saru Khan could appeal on behalf of the other co-plaintiffs, without joining them as parties to the appeal. That rule, however, authorizes one of the plaintiffs to an action, in which other co-plaintiffs are also interested, to appeal for the benefit of the latter, only if they are made parties to the appeal. The proposition is too obvious to require discussion. Authority for it will be found in Ambika Prasad v. Jhinak Singh (1), Balkaran Lal v. Malik Namdar (2) Jitendranath Chatterji v. Jhaku Mandar (3) and Balaram Pal v. Kanysha Majhi (4). We, therefore, hold that Saru Khan was not entitled to appeal on behalf of Piru and Amir plaintiffs.

Mr. Amar Nath Chopra, however, states that he omitted to implead these two persons as parties under the erroneous belief that under O. XLI, r. 4, Civil Procedure Code, it was not necessary for him to implead them as parties. He has now frankly admitted his mistake and asks us that we should exercise our powers under O. XLI, r. 2J, Civil Procedure Code, and implead Piru and Amir, plaintiffs as respondents to the appeal. After hearing Mr. Kishan Dayal for the respondents we are of opinion that it is not desirable to decide the case in the absence of the other plaintiffs and we think this to be a fit case in which we should exercise our powers under O. XLI, r. 20, Civil Procedure Code. We, there-

As the case is a very old one, we are not inclined to adjourn the case for a long time. We accordingly direct that it be placed before us as No. 1 on the list on Monday the 20th of June, 1927. As the adjournment is caused by an omission on the part of the appellant to implead these two persons as parties, we allow Mr. Kishan Dayal Rs. 32 as costs of the adjournment, which must be paid by the appellant on or before the next date of hearing.

Mr. Kishan Dial, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Tek Chand, J.—The main facts of the case are given in our order of the 15th of June, 1927, which should be read as a part of this judgment. By that order we decided to implead Piru and Amir plaintiffs as respondents to the appeal under O. XLI, r. 20, Civil Procedure Code, and Mr. Amar Nath Chopra for Saru Khan appellant undertook to communicate with these two persons and to produce them to-day. Amir has appeared to-day and is present in Court. He states that Piru died sonless more than 2 years ago. This fact is admitted by Mr. Amar Nath Chopra for the appellant and by Jan Muhammad the contesting respondent who is also present in person. As Piru deceased claimed to be a joint occupancy tenant of a common holding and as he has died sonless, his rights in the tenancy lapse to his co-tenants, namely, Saru Khan appellant and Amir respondent both of whom are already on the record. It is, therefore, not necessary to adjourn the hearing of the case to implead the heirs, (if any), of Piru deceased as respondents. Piru's name will be struck off the record.

On the merits the second appeal can be disposed of very briefly. The plaintiffs came into Court alleging that their ancestor, Hakim, had acquired the occupancy tenancy in question, that they were in possession of these occupancy rights but that on a notice issued by the defendants, they had been wrongly ejected by order of the Revenue Authorities. They, therefore, sued to recover back possession of the land comprised in the occupancy tenure. The de-defendants resisted the suit on the plea that the occupancy tenancy in question was not acquired by Hakim but that it was acquired by Sher Khan who was the father of Hakim and of Nawab Khan, the grandfather of the contesting defendants. The plaintiffs in their replication denied that the occupancy rights were acquired or that the land was ever occupied by Sher Khan. The Sub-Judge found against the defendants' contention and held that on the materials on the record it could not be held that the land was occupied by Sher Khan. In their grounds of appeal before the learned District Judge the defendants reiterated their contention that Sher Khan, the common ancestor of the parties, had held possession of the land. The learned District Judge, however, gave no finding on this point. On the other hand, he held that though the occupancy rights were held by Hakim alone in the Settlements of 1852 and 1865, and that after the death of Hakim for some reason or other the plaintiff's line decided "to pool the occupancy land of the family" and that it was in pursuance of some arrangement that the occupancy rights were transferred by the plaintiff's branch of the family to the defendants. This, however, is an entirely new case which the learned District Judge has set up in appeal for the defendants but which he was not entitled to do. No such arrangement was put forward in the written statement, nor was any issue framed on it. As pointed out already the defendants' main plea was that the occupancy rights had been acquired by Sher Khan. The learned District Judge does not discuss the point at all. His judgment in so far as it proceeds on grounds not put forward in the pleas, cannot be supported.

The learned District Judge further bases his judgment on the decision of the Revenue Assistant dated the 17th of June, 1920, in a suit brought by Amir plaintiff to challenge a notice of ejectment issued by the defendants in regard to the land in suit. He also relies upon the evidence that was led before the Revenue Authorities in that litigation and also in certain previous litigation. Now, there can be no doubt whatever, that neither the findings in the ejectment proceedings before the Revenue Authorities nor the evidence led in those proceedings could be legally relied upon in this case. Mr. Kishan Dial for the respondents has very properly conceded that he is unable to contend that this evidence was legal evidence in the case. The learned District Judge also relies on a certain lease, alleged to have been executed by Amir plaintiff in favour of the defendant. But his discussion of this matter is very confused. For the foregoing reasons the judgment of the learned District Judge cannot be called a proper judgment and we are constrained to set it aside. The case will have to be sent back to the lower Court for re-decision in accordance with law. That Court must examine afresh such of the evidence as is on the record and come to a definite finding on the issues that arose in the case.

The appeal is accepted and the case remanded to the District Judge for decision in accordance with law. Court-fee on appeal will be refunded. Costs will be costs in the case.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

ORDINARY ORIGINAL CIVIL SUIT No. 519
OF 1926.

August 8, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Venkatasubba Rao.
NARAYANDOSS BALAKRISHNADOSS
—PLAINTIFF

versus

BACHRAJ CHORDIA SOWCAR AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 16—Undue influence—Execution of mortgage by minor just come of age in favour of creditor of maternal uncle—Maternal uncle and nephew in position of fiduciary relationship—Mortgagee taking with knowledge of facts—Mortgage, whether liable to be set aside.

Where a person seeks to set aside a document executed by him to another on the ground of undue influence if there is a relation which gives rise to confidence between the parties and if the person in fiduciary position obtains an advantage—where this alone is established and nothing further—the Court gives relief to the party conferring the benefit, unless the other party shows that he did not avail himself of the confidence which subsisted between the parties. The burden is, therefore, upon him and, if he does not discharge the burden, the plaintiff succeeds. [p. 321, col. 1.]

When there is a third party involved, the position is not dissimilar. If it is shown that such third party was aware of the existence of such confidential or fiduciary relation, he is under the same disability as the party who occupied the position of confidence; that is to say, the Court gives relief to the plaintiff without demanding proof of fraud or imposition, or any specific act of undue influence. It is enough that the third party was aware of the existence of the confidential relation and the Court does not insist on proof that he was further aware of the actual exercise of undue influence. [p. 321, cols. 1 & 2.]

In such cases the third party is affected not by reason of any active participation in, but by bare knowledge of, undue influence exercised in fact or by the mere knowledge of the situation of the parties which in law gave rise to a presumption of undue influence. [p. 322, col. 1.]

It is not special relations arising from certain situations only such as, parent and child, or guardian and ward, that are jealously watched by the Court; on the other hand, the principle on which equity gives relief is extended and applied to, all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another. Similarly the Court does not fetter its discretion by a fictitious regard to the age of the person aggrieved. The law looks at the substance of the thing and it is essential that the relationship should have ceased not merely in name but in fact. [p. 323, col. 1.]

When a stranger takes a gift from a person tainted with the undue influence of another person to whom he stands in a fiduciary position, with notice of the circumstances giving rise to the equity, the Court will compel him to give up the benefit. [p. 323, col. 2.]

Where a person 20 years old executed a mortgage of almost the whole of his property in favour of a creditor of his maternal uncle for no personal benefit to himself and it was found that the uncle and nephew stood in the position of trustee and cestui que trust, that the nephew had no independent advice and was not directed to seek the disinterested opinion of his mother and paternal uncle who were alive and yielded to the importunities of the uncle who was in a position of financial bankruptcy and whom he wished to oblige, and the creditor was aware of these circumstances:

Held, that the transaction was vitiated by undue influence and liable to be set aside by the nephew. [p. 323, col. 2.]

Suit by the plaintiff to set aside a mortgage executed in favour of the 1st defendant on the ground of undue influence.

Mr. S. Doraiswami Aiyar, [for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Nugent Grant, for the Defendants.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff in this suit impeaches a mortgage executed by him. The 2nd defendant Purushothamdooss is his maternal uncle and he became indebted to the 1st defendant, a money-lender, in a large sum of money. When Purushothamdooss was pressed for re-payment the plaintiff executed a mortgage in favour of the 1st defendant securing his share in his family property and making himself liable for his uncle's debt. The transaction is challenged by the plaintiff on the ground that it is vitiated by undue influence. The short point to be decided in the case is: is it so vitiated? I may, however, point out that a mass of evidence has been adduced to show, or to rebut, that other invalidating grounds existed, namely, (1) that in the deed finally executed, the term that the amount is re-payable on demand was fraudulently inserted, contrary to the original understanding that it was re-payable only after two years; (2) that the 1st defendant falsely denied the existence of certain jewels and repudiated after the execution of the deed, his promise to return them to the 2nd defendant. Not only was evidence directed to these points but much time was taken up on that account. But when the case reached the stage of final argument, the Counsel for the plaintiff and the 1st defendant adopted the view which I was disposed to take from the start and confined themselves to the bare question—the question decisive of the case—is the transaction vitiated by undue influence? I may state that I did not prevent evidence being adduced on the other points as I felt that in the event of the case going further; the parties should have no ground of complaint on the score of any evidence having been shut out.

The following pedigree may be found useful in understanding the facts of the case:—

The father of the plaintiff died in 1914 and the plaintiff thereafter lived at Madras with his maternal uncle, the 2nd defendant, whereas his mother resided (also at Madras) in the family house along with Goverdhandoss and his son. On the 30th of September, 1917, there was a partition of the family properties. The grandfather separated from the rest and certain properties were allotted in common to the other members of the family. At the partition the plaintiff, who was an infant, was represented by his mother and his maternal uncle, the 2nd defendant, who acted as his guardian. Immediately after the partition a trust deed was executed constituting the plaintiff's grandfather and Purushothamdoss trustees for managing the properties belonging to the plaintiff, his uncle and his uncle's son. These properties, of course, included those that fell to their share at the partition. Damodardoss died in 1919 and on the 5th January, 1921, a deed came into existence which appointed one Chinna Veerappa trustee in the place of Damodardoss. Shortly afterwards Chinna Veerappa died and Purushothamdoss remained and continued to be the sole trustee.

There were dealings between the 1st defendant and Purushothamdoss and in the course of such dealings the latter became indebted to the 1st defendant in a large sum of money. It is unnecessary to go into the history of these dealings and it is sufficient to say that in August, 1925, it was found that Purushothamdoss owed the 1st defendant a sum of Rs. 24,000 and that the position of the former was extremely precarious. I must add that Purushothamdoss left Madras in 1923, and returned only about July 1925. During this period the evidence discloses that the dealings between the 1st defendant and Purushothamdoss continued and it became more and more manifest that Purushothamdoss was in difficulties. It is also important to note that during his absence from Madras the plaintiff went to live in the family house with his mother and his paternal uncle Goverdhandoss. After Purushothamdoss returned, the plaintiff seems to have continued to live at his family residence but was frequently visiting the former. This was the state of things that prevailed on the 14th August, 1925, when the suit mortgage deed was executed. On that date the plaintiff was 20 years of age and in the eye of the law an adult. It is common ground that the plaintiff was much attached to his maternal uncle. In fact, as I have shown, the boy practically lived as his ward, preferring his protection to that of his mother and his paternal uncle. The 1st defendant finding that Purushothamdoss was not in a position to pay the large amount due to him, began to feel uneasy and brought pressure to bear on him for the re-payment of his debt. A lawyer's notice was sent making a demand and it was evident that the 2nd defendant was in a state of bankruptcy. It is said that he had lands in the mofussil of some small value and that he imagined he was going to get at a future date a fabulous amount from some source. These points have not been pursued and the case was argued on the footing that Purushothamdoss was on the date of the mortgage practically a bankrupt. He has in fact since been adjudicated an insolvent and the Official Assignee now represents his estate in the suit. The 1st defendant's demands having become persistent, a proposal came to be made which was to the effect that the plaintiff was to execute a mortgage in his favour charging the plaintiff's share in certain two houses with the debt and making that share security for its re-payment. A scribe by name Rahiman Ali, a man suggested by the 1st defendant was employed and a mortgage-deed was prepared and executed. Though the plaintiff was the only individual affected by the mortgage-deed, Purushothamdoss also nominally joined in its execution. Its recitals make it perfectly clear (and there is no dispute on this point) that the debt was that of the 2nd defendant and the plaintiff derived no personal advantage. I may notice that the deed says that a trifling amount in cash was paid to the plaintiff but the evidence has shown that this is utterly false and it is not now denied that the plaintiff derived no benefit whatever from the deed. In this case there has been a lot of hard swearing on every side and I am quite prepared to endorse a remark made by one of the Counsel at the Bar that a single case hardly ever presents a greater collection of liars than have figured at this trial. The curious result has been that none of the Counsel has chosen to rely upon the evidence even of his own witnesses and with great propriety each of the Counsel has taken his stand mainly on admitted or undisputed or indisputable facts. What, then, are those facts? Besides those that I have adverted to, the evidence also shows that the plaintiff was practically not possessed of any property other than his share in these two houses. They were valued by the 1st defendant himself at Rs. 20,000 and although Purushothamdoss to suit his purposes estimates them as being worth very much more, it was not seriously suggested that the mortgage really left any margin. These two houses (the subject of the mortgage) were part of the trust estate legally in charge of the 2nd defendant. The next important point to note is, that about two weeks after the date of the mortgage Purushothamdoss made an application to this Court asking that he should be discharged from the office of trustee in respect of the estate of the plaintiff and his co-parceners (Ex. IX, dated 31st August, 1925). An order was made on that application by consent and it is alleged that the properties were thereafter formally handed to Goverdhandoss (plaintiff's paternal uncle) in whose favour Purushothamdoss also passed a promissory note dated the 8th September, 1925, for Rs. 4,000 being roughly the amount for which he was then accountable in respect of his management. That the condition of Purushothamdoss was perilous, also appears from the fact that at the instance of one Ponnandi Chetti, a criminal warrant had been issued for his arrest, first on the 17th of July, 1925, and that warrant having been returned unexecuted, a second one was issued on the 15th of August, 1925. Ponnandi Chetti had instituted criminal proceedings in respect of an alleged breach of trust by Purushothamdoss to whom certain diamonds were said to have been entrusted in his capacity as broker. The dates of those warrants are very significant, the second of them having been issued just one day subsequent to the execution of the mortgage-deed in question. It will be seen that so far I have been referring to facts which are either admitted or not denied. To the same category belong a few more facts. It is not disputed that neither the 1st defendant nor Purushothamdoss directed the plaintiff to seek independent or disinterested advice. There is then the fact that the 1st defendant was aware that the plaintiff had his mother alive and that he had also a paternal uncle. Indeed the 1st defendant admits having seen the plaintiff's mother and having spoken to the plaintiff's paternal uncle before the date of the mortgage. It is not disputed that the 1st defendant was aware that the plaintiff was then only 20 years old, that Purushothamdoss was his maternal uncle, that the properties mortgaged belonged to the plaintiff, that the debt was that of Purushothamdoss with which the plaintiff had no concern and that under the deed the latter obtained no benefit whatsoever.

Having stated facts regarding which there is practically no dispute, I shall now turn to that part of the evidence in respect of which there is some conflict,

The plaintiff who equally with Purushothamdoss and Ratanchand (the son and the main witness of the 1st defendant) has shown himself a thoroughly unreliable witness, has deposed that he was asked by them at and before the mortgage, to keep the transaction secret from every one including Goverdhandoss. Purushothamdoss who previous to and at the trial was consistently supporting the plaintiff, has, however, given a different version and said that there was no secrecy imposed and in this respect he was supported by the 1st defendant. It is difficult to say as between these three who has been guilty of the least lying, but in this instance, I am prepared to hold that the plaintiff was not expressly asked not to mention this matter to any third party. The 1st defendant admits that he had known both the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant for some years previously and that he had frequently seen the nephew in his maternal uncle's house. The 1st defendant pretends that he had, however, no knowledge of the fact that the plaintiff was living for several years under the same roof as Purushothamdoss. I have not been asked seriously to believe this and I find that the 1st defendant knew of the fact that the plaintiff was living with Purushothamdoss and as a member of his household. The 1st defendant also deposed that he was not aware of the existence of the criminal warrant. In this respect again I am not prepared to act on his evidence. Purushothamdoss swears—and in this he is corroborated by several—that he was in hiding at Mambalam, a suburb of Madras from the 6th August to the 18th August, 1925, and that during that time he was living with the 1st defendant at that place with a view to evade the criminal warrant which had been issued. I believe that this is substantially true and that the 1st defendant was aware at the time that a warrant was out for his debtor's arrest. There is another controversial point. Was the 1st defendant made aware of the existence of the trust deed? The plaintiff, Rahiman Ali the scribe, and Purushothamdoss give one version which is to the effect that the trust deed was shown to the creditor. Ratanchand the son of the 1st defendant swears he was not shown the trust deed. I have unhesitatingly come to the conclusion that the evidence of Ratanchand must be rejected on this point. I reject his evidence mainly on the ground that it is so utterly improbable. In the first place, Ratanchand admitted in his evidence that several documents constituting the title-deeds were put into his hands. He was asked in the witness-box by his Counsel to select the documents of which he was given inspection. The documents were either in English or Telugu, neither of which he professed to understand, but he went through the form of looking at each document and ultimately was able to say that certain documents alone were handed to him and not the others. Among those which he was not shown were found to be the deed of trust and the deed of appointment of a new trustee. By what method he was able to make this selection it is impossible to say. In passing I may note that according to him the partition deed was one of the documents handed to him which shows that Purushothamdoss acted at the family division as the guardian of the plaintiff. Before Ratanchand was put into the box I asked the 1st defendant's Counsel what his case was in regard to this point and he made an express statement that the only documents which were handed to his client before the transaction was entered into, were some papers in a suit including a decree. The evidence of Ratanchand is at direct variance with this statement, for according to him several other important deeds were placed in his hands. I am inclined to believe that the 1st defendant in his anxiety to make out that he was not at the time aware of the trust had recourse to this falsehood. There was no motive on the part either of the plaintiff or Purushothamdoss to suppress mention of the trust deed. As a matter of fact, we find that soon after the transaction, disputes arose between the 1st defendant on the one hand and the plaintiff and Purushothamdoss on the other. Every possible contention was put forward on the latter's behalf to show that the mortgage-deed was invalid and inoperative. It did not occur to them to say that plaintiff and Purushothamdoss stood in fiduciary relations and the transaction was, therefore, invalid. It was long after the disputes began that this aspect of the case presented itself to the legal advisers of the plaintiff and there can be, therefore, no motive on the part of the plaintiff and Purushothamdoss for withdrawing the trust deed from the documents handed to the 1st defendant. I am clearly of the opinion that the latter was on the date of the transaction aware of the peculiar relations between the uncle and the nephew by reason of the existence of, and arising out of, the trust deed.

There has been some little controversy as regards how far the plaintiff was competent to understand the nature of the transaction at the time he entered into it. He pretended that he did not know its nature when he executed the bond. After much fencing and prevaricating he greatly modified this answer and there is not the slightest doubt that he was aware, at any rate, generally, of the nature and the terms of the deed which he was called on to execute. The truth is, he had a bare knowledge of the facts, namely, that he was making himself liable for his uncle's debts and that he was giving his property as security. He was competent enough to understand this, but I do not think that he was in a position to resist the importunity of his uncle to whom he was attached. There is no evidence that he ever consulted Goverdhandoss and although there is much doubt as to when the transaction first came to his knowledge, I cannot find on the evidence that he knew it at the time the mortgage-deed was given. At any rate, on the material on record, there is nothing to show that the plaintiff sought the advice of any person, either of his paternal uncle or his mother or any stranger.

The last point that remains to be noticed is, did the 1st defendant take any part in persuading the plaintiff in entering into the suit transaction? It is not disputed that there was persuasion on the part of Purushothamdoss. The 1st defendant suggested that he left the transaction to Purushothamdoss to be put through and that he did not take an active part. It is difficult to say precisely what part the 1st defendant took, but I entertain no doubt that he was more than a mere silent participator. It is very probable that the 1st defendant in his anxiety to get his debts secured, joined with Purushothamdoss in inducing the plaintiff to execute the deed. I am prepared to believe that very little persuasion on his part was necessary, but I cannot say that he kept himself scrupulously free from the taint. His evidence is demonstrably false on so many points that I am not disposed to believe him when he says that he took no part in the transaction.

I have now stated my conclusions on points regarding which there has been some dispute and from the welter of false testimony which every one of the parties has asked me to reject, I have disentangled such facts as are reasonably free from doubt. The 1st defendant has not gone into the witness-box, his son Ratanchand has proved himself an untrustworthy witness, the plaintiff, the scribe Rahiman Ali and Purushothamdoss are unscrupulous liars and on every conceivable point, as many versions have been given as there are witnesses in the case. I have, therefore, taken care to separate out of this mass, only such facts as cannot admit of serious doubt. What then is the bearing of these facts on the question that I have to decide? To answer this question, the law on the point must be reviewed.

I shall now refer to certain cases which have clearly laid down the principles applicable to a case of this kind. The first of them is Rhodes v. Bate (1). The plaintiff was a lady about 50 years old who was living with her brother-in-law Codrington. He became indebted to Bate in a large sum of money and for this debt the plaintiff along with Codrington signed bonds in favour of Bate, and further charged almost the whole of her estate with the payment of the debt. The plaintiff complained that the documents and securities were obtained by the undue influence exercised on her by Codrington as well as Bate both of whom, she alleged, stood in confidential relations to her. I may note in passing that this case differs from the present one, in so far as the creditor, the 1st defendant, does not stand in any fiduciary relation to the plaintiff. But the case establishes certain propositions which have a close bearing on the case I have to decide.

Lord Justice Turner after examining the evidence found that at the date of some of the transactions complained against, Bate stood in confidential relations with the plaintiff and as the facts of the case brought it within the principles which the Lord Justice stated in his judgment, he set aside those transactions.

What then are the principles stated?

(1) Where confidential relations exist, those standing in such relations cannot entitle themselves to hold benefits unless they can show that the persons who have conferred the benefits had competent and independent advice. In this case, neither does the age nor the capacity of the person conferring the benefit affect the principle.

This is stated by the learned Lord Justice to be "a settled general principle of the Court".

(2) Age and capacity are considerations which may be of importance in cases where no confidential relation exists.

Knight Bruce, L. J., concurs in this judgment. In this case, there is a distinct finding that the plaintiff was not of weak mind and was perfectly competent to understand what she did (page 256*). There is also a finding that the plaintiff signed the deeds in question freely and voluntarily and without pressure or solicitation on the part of the defendant, that the contents were fully explained to her and she clearly understood their nature and effect (page 257*). It is also noticeable that the judgment makes mention of the fact that Bate told the plaintiff that Codrington would not be in a position to re-pay the debt and that ultimately she would be obliged to re-pay it. (page 261*). Bate told the plaintiff this and cautioned her but the learned Lord Justice says that Bate did not press the subject upon her as an independent and disinterested adviser would have done, nor did he recommend the plaintiff to employ an independent Solicitor (page 261*).

The facts of this case serve to show with what strictness the principle of the law enunciated in the judgment is enforced.

Espey v. Lake (2) is an instructive case. The plaintiff was a young lady who had just come of age and joined in making with her step-father Speakman as his surety, a promissory note in favour of Lake to whom Speakman owed a sum of money. The plaintiff was living with her mother and step father from infancy. She received no consideration for the note which was given for the debt of her step-father. The transaction was challenged by the plaintiff and it was set aside by Turner, V.C. It will be seen that in this case the relationship was not in the nature of a trust; nor was it strictly that of guardian and ward. The transaction was set aside on the ground that Speakman stood to the plaintiff in a relation which gave rise to confidence between the parties. The step-father stood in loco parentis to the plaintiff and that was considered sufficient. It is also to be noted that this is a case of influence arising by inference from the situation of the parties. It is not necessary to prove by direct evidence that any deception of fraud was practised. Speakman being in confidential position, it was incumbent upon him to affirmatively prove that he did not take advantage of the position of influence which subsisted between the parties. He failed to do it and the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. So far as Lake was concerned, he had notice of the equities arising from the position of the parties and that was deemed sufficient as against him. There is a close resemblance between this and the present case. If it is shown that the parties stood in such a situation as to give rise to confidence between them and that the third party who derives the benefit was aware of the existence of this relation—if this is shown, the third party is not entitled to retain the security, unless he shows that the party conferring the benefit was a free agent and had independent and disinterested advice. It is not necessary for the party impeaching the transaction to prove that he was deceived by the person who put himself in loco parentis towards him; nor is it necessary for him to make out that the third party connived at any actual fraud. The doctrine is the result of the jealousy and solicitude with which Courts of Equity watch the interests of the weaker party where a special confidential or fiduciary relation is established. To sum up (1) if there is a relation which gives rise to confidence between the parties and if the person in fiduciary position obtains an advantage—where this alone is established and nothing further, the Court gives relief to the party conferring the benefit, unless the other party shows that he did not avail himself of the confidence which subsisted between the parties. The burden is, therefore, upon him, and, if he does not discharge the burden, the plaintiff succeeds. (2) When there is a third party involved, the position is not dissimilar. If it is shown that he was aware of the existence of such confidential or fiduciary relation, he is under the same disability as the party who occupied the position of confidence; that is to say, the Court gives relief to the plaintiff without demanding proof of fraud, or imposition, or any specific act of undue influence. It is enough that the third party was aware of the existence of the confidential relation and the Courts do not insist on proof that he was further aware of the actual exercise of undue influence.

These two propositions are well-settled and both these principles are applicable to the facts of the present case. In Espey v. Lake (2), the case which I have been discussing, the Vice-Chancellor makes an observation which I find repeatedly occurs in the cases on the subject, viz., that the creditor, the third party, was not guilty of any moral fraud, nor had he a knowledge of the principles which guide a Court of Equity in such cases. This does not any-the-less render the third party liable to surrender the benefit. This is a remark which one cannot disregard in dealing with a case of the kind before me.

Archer v. Hudson (3) is another case referred to by Mr. S. Doraiswami Aiyar for the plaintiff which is directly in point. The parties who stood in fiduciary relations were uncle and niece. The uncle over-drew his account at his bankers and the niece entered into a voluntary security for his debt. The Court found that the person who was representing the Bank in the transaction was well acquainted with the relative situation of these two parties. Lord Langdale, M. R., held (and it was subsequently affirmed by the Lord Chancellor) that, where there is a pecuniary transaction between a child and one in loco parentis towards her just after she comes of age and prior to what may be called a complete "emancipation" without any benefit moving to the child, the presumption is that an undue influence has been exercised to procure that liability on the part of the child. It must be shown, if the creditor is to succeed, that the child had such protection as would secure to her a free and unfettered judgment independent of any sort of control. In this case again, it will be observed that the undue influence was that which arose by inference from the situation of the parties. It will also be observed that the third party was merely aware of the existence of the confidential relation and that was held sufficient to disentitle him to retain the benefit.

(3) (1844) 7 Beav. 551; 49 E. R. 1180; 13 L. J. Ch. 330; 8 Jur. 701; 64 R. R. 152.

Maitland v. Irving (4) is another case which applies these well settled principles and I do not propose to state the facts of that case in great detail. That was also the case of a niece who had just come of age and the other party was her uncle who had previously been her guardian. There too the third party was a creditor to whom the uncle owed a debt for which the plaintiff, the niece, made herself liable. In that case also the creditor was aware of the peculiar confidential relations between the two parties and took the security without making any enquiry or taking any pains to ascertain whether the niece was a free agent who acted with the full knowledge of the consequences of her act. From these facts the Court firstly inferred undue influence and secondly held that the knowledge of the creditor was sufficient to bring the case within the principles I have stated.

Berdoe v. Dawson (5), Turnbull & Co. v. Duval (6) and Chaplin v. Brammall (7) are cases of the same kind and do not call for any special remarks.

I may here pause to re state, at the risk of repetition the principle established by these cases. With the exception of Rhodes v. Bate (1) and Turnbull & Co. v. Duval (6) (which are of a peculiar kind being open to the double objection of there being two persons in a position of special influence, one of whom was the creditor himself) these various cases illustrate and enforce the same point. In each of them, there was a third party present besides the individuals standing to each other in fiduciary relations—and the third party was held affected not by reason of any active participation in, but by bare knowledge of, undue influence exercised in fact, or as is more frequently the case, and this is important, by the mere knowledge of the situation of the parties which in law gave rise to a presumption of undue influence.

Having regard to the facts of the present case I may with advantage refer to another aspect emphasised in some of the authorities to which I have referred. In Espey v. Lake (2), Turnbull & Co. v. Duval (6) and Chaplin v. Brammall (7), the stranger creditor claimed immunity on the ground that he took no part in the transaction but left it entirely to the person in fiduciary position. This argument was in each of these cases expressly negatived. The 1st defendant in the present case has taken up a somewhat similar position but that cannot avail him.

Mr. Grant for the 1st defendant has cited two cases. The first of them Bainbrigge v. Browne (8) does not support him as it states (and very clearly) the law in just the same terms as the other cases which have been already referred to. On the evidence it was found in that case that the defendants had no notice of the circumstances giving rise to the equity. Fry J., in his judgment says:—

"I think that the defendants were entitled to come to the conclusion that the children were resident away from their father, not under his control, fully emancipated from him, assisted by the advice of their friends, and by the advice of a Solicitor who was bound to do his duty to them."

This passage shows that the case, far from supporting Mr. Grant is really against his contention.

The second case relied on by Mr. Grant is Thornber v. Sheard (9) which is said to decide the other way (of which I am doubtful) but if it does, it is against the clear weight of authority and I cannot follow it. There is an Indian case Raj Coomarr Roy v. Alfuzuddin Ahmed (10) a decision of a single Judge which purporting to follow Thornber v. Sheard (9) states the law thus:

"But I do not find any authority for holding that a third party who stands in no confidential relation to the grantor, is bound in the first instance to show that no undue influence was used."

I must with the greatest respect dissent from this observation and hold that it does not correctly represent the law on the point.

This being the legal position, I shall now examine whether the facts I have stated bring the present case within the principles laid down in these various decisions. In discussing the facts I have carefully separated those that are admitted or not denied from those that are disputed. It seems to me that I cannot support this transaction even if I confine myself only to indisputable and undisputed facts. Supposing this was a transaction between the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant and there was no third party in the case, could this be supported? That they stood in confidential or fiduciary relations is well established by authority. It is not special relations arising from certain situations only such as, parent and child, or guardian and ward, that are jealously watched by the Court; on the other hand, the principle on which equity gives relief is extended and applied to, all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another (White and Tudor's Leading Cases, 8th Edition, Vol. I, page 282). Similarly, the Court does not fetter its discretion by a fictitious regard to the age of the person aggrieved; for the fact that the child has attained the bare age of majority signifies little and complete emancipation is insisted on. The law looks at the substance of the thing and it is essential that the relationship should have ceased not merely in name, but in fact. The plaintiff lived for several years with, and under the protection of, the 2nd defendant who besides was his maternal uncle and acted as his guardian at the family partition. The plaintiff again was not fully removed from the influence of the 2nd defendant and it cannot be said that there was complete emancipation. These facts alone would give rise to a position of great confidence between the parties. If the case had been merely one between the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant, it would have been the latter's clear duty to see that the relations were completely dissolved and that the donor had independent and disinterested advice.

Lindley, L. J., in Allcard v. Skinner (11) classifies cases in which equity invalidates gifts into two groups: the second group with which we are concerned, consists of cases where the Courts infer undue influence from the mere position of the parties and throws upon the donee the burden of proving that he has not abused his position and that the donor had independent advice and was removed from the donee's influence. In such cases, the transaction is disallowed not on account of any positive fraud but because it is contrary to the general policy of the law (White and Tudor's Leading Cases, pages 28 and 279).

To this group belongs the present case. No evidence has been given of the kind required and it, therefore, follows that if the transaction was between the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant, a Court of Equity would not uphold it.

How does the presence of the third party then affect this case? I have already said that when a stranger takes the gift tainted with the undue influence of the person in fiduciary position, with notice of the circumstances giving rise to the equity, the Court will compel him to give up the benefit. Now applying this rule and again confining myself to admitted facts, I am of the opinion that the 1st defendant is bound to surrender the benefit. He was aware of the antecedent confidential relations, he was also aware that they were not completely dissolved and that the parties are not met on equal terms; he was further aware that the plaintiff was not in a position to exercise free, unfettered and deliberate judgment, and that he was not directed to seek disinterested or independent advice. On these facts alone, the plaintiff can, in my opinion, succeed.

But whatever my own view may be, it is unnecessary to rest my judgment on admitted facts alone. On the date of the transaction the plaintiff and the 2nd defendant occupied the position of trustee and cestui que trust and I have found that the 1st defendant was aware of the existence of this special relationship. I have further found that the plaintiff who was not a free agent equal to protecting himself, was persuaded by Purushothamdoss to enter into this transaction and that he was so drawn into this inequitable and unconscionable bargain also in some measure under the influence of the 1st defendant himself. In any case, being aware that there was importunity by Purushothamdoss which the plaintiff was unable to resist, he took full advantage of it. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the transaction cannot be upheld and I set it aside.

There remains only one small matter which I must notice. The mortgage-deed was attacked by the plaintiff inter alia upon the ground that when he executed it none of the attesting witnesses was present,

This case partially broke down when his chief witness Rahiman Ali was obliged to modify his previous answer and say that the plaintiff had admitted execution before the attesting witnesses signed their names. This ground was not seriously relied on and I do not think I need pursue the point.

As regards costs, I have an observation to make. The conduct of the 1st defendant in entering into the transaction was not dishonest or morally wrong and it is on account of the equitable principles which the Court applies that the plaintiff succeeds. If, therefore, the 1st defendant had been content to state the truth and leave the law to take its course, I should have been inclined to deprive the plaintiff of his costs, in view of the fact that he has given false evidence. But as the 1st defendant himself has adduced much untrue evidence, I do not think there is any reason for departing from the ordinary rule and I direct that he shall pay the plaintiff his costs of the suit.

I fix the remuneration of the short hand clerks at Rs. 300. I direct that the plaintiff and the 1st defendant shall each pay for the transcript of the evidence and the copies supplied, Rs. 150. If either of them pays more than his share in the first instance, he will be entitled to recover the excess from the other.

FAKIR CHAND PAL AND OTHERS—

OPPOSITE PARTY.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 14—Suit ordered to be tried in another Court—No want of jurisdiction—Plaintiff, whether entitled to exclusion of time—Time for obtaining copy of order, whether can be excluded.

A Union Court in which a suit for recovery of money was filed passed an order that the suit be conducted in a proper Court as it was of opinion that it was desirable that there should be a proper trial conducted by persons versed in law. The plaintiff subsequently filed the suit in the Small Cause Court;

Held, (1) that the plaintiff was not entitled to exclude the period of time during which the suit was pending in the Union Court, under s. 14 of the Limitation Act, as the Union Court did not decline to entertain the suit, or decide that it had no jurisdiction or that through want of jurisdiction or any other cause it was unable to entertain the suit; [p. 325, col. 1.]

(2) that the plaintiff was not entitled to exclude the period of time required for obtaining a copy of the order of the Union Court as the suit could have been filed without such copy. [ibid.]

Revision against a decision of the Munsif, Fourth Court, Munshigunj, dated the 22nd December, 1926.

Babū Panchanan Ghose, Radhika Ranjan Guha and Jatis Chandra Guha, for the Petitioner.

Babu Jatindra Mohan Chowdhury, for Babu Jitendra Nath Sen Gupta, for the Opposite-Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Causes Courts Act to revise a decree passed by the learned Munsif of the Small Cause Court at Munshigunge. The suit was brought to recover money lent upon interest which was re-payable on demand. The money was lent on the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th May, 1923. On the 14th June, 1926, the plaintiff filed the present suit. Prima facie his cause of action is time-barred. The learned Munsif, however, held that the claim was not time-barred, and decreed the suit in part.

Two points are taken by the learned Vakil for the opposite party. The first is that the period between the 2nd May, 1926, and 6th June, 1926, should be deducted from the period of limitation upon the ground that during that period the petitioner was prosecuting in good faith a suit to recover the subject-matter of the present suit in the Union Court in Bahar, which Court from defect of jurisdiction or through causes of a like nature was unable to entertain it. It was the common case of the petitioner and the opposite party that in law and in fact the Union Court of Bahar had jurisdiction to entertain the suit. But the learned Vakil for the opposite party contended having regard to all orders passed by the Union Court that the opposite party should be given the benefit of s. 14 of the Limitation Act upon the ground that his failure to prosecute the suit in the Small Cause Court was due not to lack of diligence on his part but to the act of the Union Court. When the suit came on for hearing before Union Court that Court passed the following order: "It being desirable that there should be a proper trial conducted by persons versed in law of the question raised regarding the document filed by the plaintiff and regarding the question of the rate of interest, this Court orders that the suit be conducted in the proper Court." I am unable to accede to this contention. The opposite party was guilty of considerable and unreasonable delay in taking steps to recover the debt due to him. He waited until the 2nd May, 1926, (within two or three days of the expiration of the three years' period of limitation) before he filed his suit in the Union Court. If he had filed his suit with due diligence in the Union Court there would be ample time after the Union Court had considered the matter for him to have presented his suit in the Court of Small Causes within time. Further, I am not prepared to hold, having regard to what fell from the Union Court on the 6th June that that Court intended thereby to decline to entertain the suit or to decide that it had no jurisdiction or that through want of jurisdiction or any other cause of a like nature it was unable to entertain the suit.

The second contention upon which the learned Vakil for the opposite party sought to uphold the decision under review was that, assuming that he was entitled to the benefit of s. 14 for the period between the 2nd of May and 6th of June, he was also entitled upon the same ground to the benefit of s. 14 in respect of the period from the 6th June to 14th June because on the 6th June he had applied for a copy of the order of the Union Court that had been passed on that date, but the copy was not supplied to him until the 12th June, which was a Saturday, and he filed his suit in the Small Cause Court on the following Monday, the 14th. In support of this contention he relied upon the case of Lakshiram Mandal v. Sonatun Basar (1) decided by Mookerjee and Teunon, JJ., in which their Lordships gave a very wide and liberal interpretation to the provisions of s. 14. It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to the correctness of that decision because, in my opinion, it was unnecessary for the opposite party to wait from the 6th to the 14th of June before he filed his suit in the Small Cause Court. The suit could have been filed without a copy of the order of the Union Court, although no doubt it would have been right and proper to draw the attention of the Small Cause Court to what had taken place in the Union Court in due course. In my opinion, neither of the two grounds upon which the learned Vakil on behalf of the opposite party has based his contention that the order under review should be supported is sound.

The result is that the suit in the Small Cause Court was barred by limitation, and the decree passed by the Munsif on the 22nd December, 1926, cannot stand. The decree is set aside, and the suit dismissed.

In the circumstances of this case I make no order as to costs in either Court, and I desire to express no opinion as to whether it is still open to the opposite party to prosecute the proceedings which he initiated on the 2nd May before the Union Court.

Dr. G. C. Naurang, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff sues for a declaration of his title to the property of which the last male owner was Hardit Singh and which is now in the plaintiff's possession. His claim is based on a deed executed by Hardit Singh on the 20th August, 1893, by which he gifted the whole of his property to Attar Singh, father of the plaintiff, with this reservation that he (Hardit Singh) would have full power to deal with his property so long as he would live and that after his death his wife Har Devi whose nephew Attar Singh was, would have the same power during her lifetime. Thus the gift was not to take immediate effect. It was further recited that in the deed Attar Singh was the duly adopted son of Hardit Singh. Hardit Singh died in 1896 leaving him surviving his wife Har Devi and his adopted son Attar Singh, and in accordance with the provisions of the deed Musammatt Har Devi succeeded to his entire estate.

Attar Singh died in 1903. His son, the plaintiff, lived with Musammatt Har Devi till her death which occurred in 1920. Musammatt Har Devi during her lifetime put the plaintiff in possession of her property and applied for mutation of the landed estate in his name. This was sanctioned about a week before her death. Hardit Singh's collaterals (who figure as defendants in this litigation) appealed against this mutation order and the Collector accepting their appeal directed the plaintiff to establish his title in a Civil Court. This is the origin of the suit.

The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the document was a forgery and that even if it was genuine it was inadmissible in evidence for want of registration because it was a deed of gift. The trial Court overruled both these pleas and decreed the plaintiff's suit, finding that the deed was duly executed by Hardit Singh and was to all intents and purpose a Will and that as Attar Singh had a vested interest in the property of Hardit Singh who had died before him the collaterals of Hardit Singh could not divest the son of Attar Singh of that interest.

On appeal the District Judge also came to the conclusion that the document was genuine and it was not a deed of gift; but relying on Mela Singh v. Gurdas (1), he dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the ground that what Hardit Singh intended was to appoint Attar Singh his heir and that the son of the heir thus appointed had no right to succession. Against that decision the plaintiff has appeared in this Court in second appeal.

From the provisions of the deed taken as a whole it appears to us that it is not a deed of gift or alienation or adoption as contended by the respondents' Counsel; nor is it a deed appointing an heir as held by the lower Appellate Court. It is clear that Hardit Singh did not adopt Attar Singh as his son by this deed. The adoption had taken place sometime before the execution of the deed and the deed only contains a recital of that adoption. Further, the intention of the executant, as evidenced by the deed, undoubtedly was to bequeath his property to his adopted son or the heir appointed by him, because the incidents enumerated in the deed appertain to a disposition by Will and not to a gift. Consequently the term 'gift' applied to the disposition was undoubtedly a misnomer. Further it is clear that the legatees acquired a heritable vested interest in the property on the death of the testator as the property was certainly to come to him on the death of the testator's widow who had succeeded only to a life-interest therein. This being so, the plaintiff was the rightful successor on the death of the widow. The principle laid down in Mela Singh v. Gurdas (1) does not affect the plaintiff's right in his father having as the appointed heir survived the appointer.

We, therefore, accept the appeal and reversing the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court, restore that of the trial Court. The respondents will pay the plaintiff's costs throughout.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

INSOLVENCY JURISDICTION CASE No. 48 OF 1925.

April 7, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Page.

In re J. M. GREGORY.

Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (III of 1909), ss. 6 (2) (c), 8 (1)—Calcutta Insolvency Rules, r. 5—Registrar in insolvency, jurisdiction of, to rescind order of discharge—Successive insolvencies—Rescission of order of discharge in prior insolvency—Creditors in prior insolvency, whether entitled to prove in second insolvency.

A person was adjudicated an insolvent by the Registrar in Insolvency in 1920. No assets were recovered and he was unconditionally discharged. He was again adjudicated an insolvent in 1925 and property which he had acquired subsequent to his first discharge vested in the Receiver. Meanwhile the order of discharge in the previous insolvency was cancelled by the Registrar on the ground that the insolvent had misled the Court, and the adjudication was revived. Creditors in the previous insolvency applied for participation of the assets in the later insolvency:

Held, (1) that the Registrar had power to cancel the previous order of discharge passed by him; [p. 327, col. 2.]

(2) that the Official Assignee, as the representative of the creditors in the first insolvency, was entitled to prove in the second insolvency and to receive dividends pari passu with the creditors in the second insolvency. [p. 328, col. 1.]

A Registrar in Insolvency has jurisdiction to pass an order rescinding an order of discharge that he himself has made, whether the application for rescission is opposed or unopposed. [p. 327, col. 2; p. 328, col. 1.]

Mr. A. A. Avetoom, for the Creditors in the first insolvency.

Mr. B. K. Ghosh, for the Creditors in the second insolvency.

JUDGMENT.—On the 4th February, 1915, John Marchmont Gregory was adjudicated insolvent, on his own petition. No assets were recovered by the Official Assignee in that insolvency, and on the 3rd August, 1920, the insolvent obtained an unconditional discharge.

On the 18th February, 1925, John Marchmont Gregory on his own petition was again adjudicated insolvent, and his property thereupon became vested in the Official Assignee for distribution among his creditors under ss. 17 and 52 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (III of 1909).

On the 13th July, 1926, as a result of the transaction into which the insolvent had entered after he had obtained his discharge from the first insolvency, and before the second adjudication, a sum of Rs. 97,670-12 was acquired by the insolvent, and passed into the hands of the Official Assignee as assets distributable in the second insolvency. Meanwhile, on the 13th April, 1925 the order of discharge of the 3rd August, 1920, was rescinded, on the ground that when applying for his discharge the insolvent had misled the Court as to the state of his affairs. Accordingly, it was ordered that the adjudication of the 4th February, 1915, should be revived. On the 10th February, 1927, pursuant to s. 91 of the Insolvency Act an order was made that the proceedings in the two insolvencies should be consolidated. All the above orders were passed by the Registrar in Insolvency.

The question that arises on this petition is whether the creditors in the first insolvency are entitled to participate in the said sum of Rs. 97,670-12 and any other assets distributable in the second insolvency. The creditors in the second insolvency contend (1) that the order of the 30th April, 1925 rescinding the order of discharge was ultra vires the Registrar in Insolvency, and is null and void; (2) that in any event, having regard to the order of discharge, the rights of the creditors in the first insolvency ought to be postponed to those of the creditors in the second insolvency.

In support of the first contention learned Counsel for the petitioner urged that, inasmuch as the application for an order rescinding the order of discharge was a substantive and opposed application, the Registrar in Insolvency had no jurisdiction in the matter. Now, the Registrar in Insolvency has no jurisdiction to entertain an opposed application for the discharge of an insolvent, and it was argued with plausibility that the Registrar in Insolvency ought not to be entitled to hear an opposed application for the rescission of an order of discharge, because the application, if granted, might re-act upon the rights of persons who in good faith had transacted business with the insolvent after the order of discharge and prior to its rescission in a manner gravely prejudicial to their interests. There is much force in this contention; but I am concerned to ascertain, not whether the Registrar in Insolvency ought to have jurisdiction, but whether he has it, and under the law as it obtains at present I am of opinion that the Registrar in Insolvency was entitled to make the order of the 13th April, 1925.

The order of discharge of the 3rd August, 1920, was passed by the Registrar in Insolvency upon the unopposed application of the insolvent. That order the Registrar had jurisdiction to make under s. 6(2) of the Insolvency Act, and the direction of Jenkins, C. J., dated 26th May, 1915.

It appears to me that under s. 8(1) of the Insolvency Act the Registrar in Insolvency had jurisdiction to pass the order of the 30th April, 1925, rescinding the order of discharge that he himself had made, whether the application for rescission was opposed or unopposed. [See In re Summers, Ex parte Official Receiver (1).] Further, under s. 6 (2) (c) of the Insolvency Act, and General Rule 5 of the Calcutta Insolvency Rules of 1910, in my opinion, the Registrar in Insolvency had jurisdiction also to hear the application for rescission of the order of discharge as being an application "that may be heard and determined in Chambers."

No appeal has been preferred against the order of the 13th April, 1925, and upon both these grounds I am of opinion, that the order of the 30th April, 1923, rescinding the order of discharge of the 3rd August, 1920, is a valid and effective order.

In these circumstances, as I apprehend the matter, the respective rights of the creditors in the two insolvencies would be the same whether or not the order consolidating the insolvencies had been made. It appears to me that, subject to any bona fide and valid disposition of the property of the insolvent that had been effected between the date of his discharge and its rescission, the said sum of Rs. 97,670-12 and any other assets recovered by the Official Assignee in the second insolvency would become assets distributable in the second insolvency, and that the Official Assignee as the representative of the creditors in the first insolvency is entitled to prove in the second insolvency, and to receive dividends pari passu with the creditors in the second insolvency.

A solution of the problem in this sense, I think, is in consonance with the ratio underlying the provisions of s. 39 (1) of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1915, and the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Pitt, In re Gosling (2). I can understand that the creditors in the second insolvency may feel aggrieved that the creditors in the first insolvency should receive a share of the assets recovered in the second insolvency as a result of a transaction into which the insolvent entered when he was sui juris and discharged from liability under the first insolvency; but the hardship is more apparent than real, for if persons choose to have business relations with a debtor who has obtained his discharge, but who in certain events may again revert to a state of insolvency, such persons take the risks that are incidental to all transactions with persons under actual or potential disability, (such as a minor or a woman possessing a Hindu widow's estate), and have only themselves to blame if they have miscalculated the chances of the transaction to which they have chosen to become parties.

An order will be passed giving effect to the view that I have expressed. The costs of both sets of creditors as of a hearing will be paid out of the assets available for distribution in the second insolvency.

Hindu Law—Widow—Gift by widow, validity of—Absence of challenge by reversioners—Donee's title, whether dates from date of gift—Death of donee—Donee's heir, rights of.

A gift by a Hindu widow is not void, but is a good alienation until and unless it is challenged by the reversioner, and in case the reversioner does not challenge the alienation a Court of Law will not permit a third party to challenge it. [p. 330, col. 2.]

Collector of Masulipatam v. Kavaly Vencata Narainapah (1), Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debi (2), Bajrangî Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (3), and Kesho Prasad Singh v. Chandrika Prasad Singh (4), relied on.

A Hindu widow made a gift in 1904. She died in 1907. The donee died in 1914 and was succeeded by his mother. The gift was not challenged by any of the reversioners:

Held, that the gift conferred a good title on the donee from the date of the gift and the donee's mother, therefore, held the properties not as a trespasser but as an heir with a limited estate. [p. 330, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the suit out of which this appeal arises are as follows. A certain Bhup Singh owned landed property in the village of Mela Ram Kunwar in the Unao District. Upon his death this property descended to his widow Musammât Ganesh Kunwar, who held in it the estate of a Hindu widow under the Mitakshara Law. Musammât Ganesh Kunwar transferred this property by gift to Kunwar Singh and Dharam Angad Singh on the 22nd of May, 1904. She died in 1907. Dharam Angad Singh died, and Kunwar Singh remained in possession of the whole property. He died in 1914, and was succeeded by his mother Musammatt Jamuna Kunwar, who has executed certain transfers in respect of the property. She is still alive. The present suit has been brought by the reversioners to the estate of Kunwar Singh for a declaration that the transfers by Musammatt Jamuna Kunwar are only effective during her life, and that they will have no effect against the plaintiffs-reversioners after her death. The learned trial Judge has decided the point in the plaintiffs' favour. Musammatt Jamuna Kunwar and her transferees have filed the present appeal. They base their case upon the following argument. This argument is, that Ganesh Kunwar having only the estate of a Hindu widow had no power to transfer that estate by gift for a period extending beyond her own lifetime, and that a transfer by her must be considered not as voidable but as void for the period after her death. The argument continues that in these circumstances Kunwar Singh must be considered to have been a trespasser in possession of the property from the year 1907 when Musammatt Ganesh Kunwar died to the year 1914 when he died himself, and that at the time of his death he had acquired no prescriptive title as he had been in possession for less than twelve years. The argument concludes that after the death of Kunwar Singh his mother Musammatt Jamuna Kunwar obtained possession without title and as a trespasser inasmuch as her son Kunwar Singh had acquired no title in this property, which she could inherit, and that her title has become effective through prescription as she had been in possession for more than twelve years before the present suit was instituted.

In order to decide this plea it is necessary to look at the exact powers of Musammatt Ganesh Kunwar. The first authoritative decision as to the powers of a Hindu widow will be found in the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of 1861 in Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavalry Venkata Narrainapah (1). Their Lordships say at page 550* :—

"It is admitted, on all hands, that if there be collateral heirs of the husband, the widow cannot of her own will alien the property except for special purposes. For religious or charitable purposes, or those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband, she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last she must show necessity. On the other hand, it may be taken as established that an alienation by her which would not otherwise be legitimate, may become so if made with the consent of her husband's kindred. But it surely is not the necessary or logical consequence of this latter proposition that in the absence of collateral heirs to the husband or on their failure, the fetter on the widow's power of alienation altogether drops. The exception in favour of alienation with consent may be due to a presumption of law that where that consent is given the purpose for which the alienation is made must be proper."

We interpret their Lordships to lay down here a rule which affects all alienations and not only alienations which purport to be for necessity or religious or charitable purposes. We cannot interpret the words "an alienation by her which would not otherwise be legitimate" as so narrow as not to include an alienation by gift. Therefore we interpret the latter portion of this passage to mean that a gift made by a Hindu widow, which is a form of alienation which she is not ordinarily competent to make, can become a valid alienation if made with the consent of her husband's kindred. The latter passage must, however, be qualified by the further direction that, if her husband has no kindred or the kindred have failed before they have had an effective opportunity of objecting, the abstention to object cannot be regarded as a consent. This is obvious. If there are no kindred there can be neither consent nor objection and if the kindred have failed before the opportunity has arisen the result is the same.

The next authority to which we refer is the decision in Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debi (2). This was decided in 1906. Lord Davey in that judgment adds materially to the rule of law laid down in Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavalry Vencata Narrainapah (1). He says at page 91* :—

"A Hindu widow is not a tenant for life, but is owner of her husband's property subject to certain restrictions on alienation and subject to its devolving upon her husband's heirs upon her death. But she may alienate it subject to certain conditions being complied with. Her alienation is not, therefore, absolutely void, but it is prima facie voidable at the election of the reversionary heir. He may think fit to affirm it, or he may at his pleasure treat it as a nullity without the intervention of any Court, and he shows his election to do the latter by commencing an action to recover possession of the property. There is, in fact, nothing for the Court either to set aside or cancel as a condition precedent to the right of action of the reversionary heir."

Lord Davey here, according to our construction, has laid down the following important addition. An alienation by a Hindu widow is a good alienation unless and until the alienation is challenged by the reversioner. In a case in which the reversioner has not challenged the alienation a Court of Law would not permit a third party to challenge it. The alienation is good until it is challenged by the reversioner. This carries the previous doctrine further for it introduces the following principle. Consent can be implied from abstention to challenge when there are in existence persons who have a right to challenge.

We now come to the third authoritative decision in Bajrangi Singh v. Manokarnika Bakhsh Singh (3). Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee decided this appeal in 1907. They have discussed the restrictions imposed by the Hindu Law upon a widow's power to alienate her deceased husband's estate at page 11† onwards and have discussed in particular the principles laid down in Collector of Masulipatam v. Cavalry Vencata Narrainapah (1). They have considered the views of various High Courts in India upon the subject. They have approved the views of certain High Courts and have not approved the views of others, and they have added this important principle to the principles which we have enunciated. They say at page 16† :—

(3) 35 I. A. 1; 30 A. 1; 9 Bom. L. R. 1348; 12 C. W. N. 74; 17 M. L. J. 605; 6 C. L. J. 766; 5 A. L. J. 1; 3 M. L. T. 1; 41 O. C. 78 (P. C.).

†Pages of 35 I. A.—[Ed.]

"Ordinarily the consent of the whole body of persons constituting the next reversion should be obtained, though there may be cases in which special circumstances may render the strict enforcement of this rule impossible."

That is to say, an alienation which, if challenged, would be set aside, is a good alienation if the whole body of persons constituting the next reversion assent to it, and into this principle must be read the principle that their consent will be presumed from the failure to contest as was laid down in Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debt (2). This is the law. How is it to be applied to the facts of the present case? We have it as an admitted fact that on the death of Bhup Singh's widow Ganesh Kunwar there were persons entitled to succeed to his estate who could challenge her alienation by gift. She died in 1907. We have it as an admitted fact that no attempt was made to challenge this transfer by gift and that by the year 1919 no right of challenge legally remained. In these circumstances the gift by Musammam Ganesh Kunwar to Kunwar Singh must be considered as a valid alienation from the date of the deed of transfer and it must be considered that Kunwar Singh between the years 1907 and 1914 was holding the property not as a trespasser but as a transferee with good title. In these circumstances the property passed on the death of Kunwar Singh to his mother Jamuna Kunwar as a Hindu mother's estate. She has no right to transfer this property for a period beyond her lifetime in the face of objection by the reversioners. The reversioners having objected, the Court below has arrived at a correct decision that the suit should succeed. We have been referred by the learned Counsel for the respondents to the decision of a Bench of the Patna High Court in Kesho Prasad Singh v. Chandrika Prasad Singh (4). The learned Judges composing that Bench have arrived at a conclusion similar to the conclusion at which we have arrived on facts similar to the facts in this suit. At page 228* the learned Chief Justice says:—

"The question is whether a gift of the whole of her husband's property made by a Hindu widow, not challenged by the reversioners during her lifetime and acquiesced in by those who would take a vested interest after her death can be challenged by any one else. In my opinion there can be only one answer to this question. It is the reversioners and the reversioners alone who can dispute the gift. If they choose to allow the property to which they are entitled to remain in the possession of the donee that is their affair and no one else can object."

As a result this appeal is dismissed with costs.

If in an order of reference there is an implied agreement that further evidence is not to be put forward by the parties and that the parties have sufficiently and completely stated their case, an award passed on the reference cannot be held to be invalid merely because the arbitrators did not give notice that they were prepared to receive evidence. Appeal against an order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Anantapur, dated the 25th March, 1926, and passed in O. S. No. 36 of 1925 (O. S. No. 6 of 1925 of the District Court).

Mr. B. Sitarama Rao, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. Somayya, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Anantapur, who has given a decree in terms of an award passed on private arbitration between the plaintiffs on the one side and the defendants on the other. The decree follows the terms of the award. It is pleaded before us that the arbitration award is invalid for two reasons. The first is that the arbitrators did not allow the defendants to adduce evidence or even to state their case. Now, in the terms of the reference itself which was signed by the parties, it is clearly stated that "both the parties have represented before you, what each of us has to say about his respective rights in the family property." It is, therefore, a most disingenuous statement in the petition by the defendants that the arbitrators did not even allow them to state their case. As regards the contention that the arbitrators did not even allow them to adduce evidence, we read the reference to mean that the arbitrators had already heard the case of each side and all that remained was to pass a decision after such further information as the arbitrators themselves desired. There is no hint in the order of reference that any evidence was sought for by either party or expected to be put forward. It is in evidence that the arbitrators heard the parties several times and it is not suggested that on any occasion the defendants requested them to hear the evidence on their behalf. It is argued that, as a matter of law, the arbitrators are bound to give notice to parties to adduce evidence, and that as this was not done in this case the award is invalid. A ruling of this Court to which one of us was a party reported as Krottapalli Gopalan v. Myneni Suryanarayana (1) is cited as an authority for that proposition. The conduct of the proceedings depends upon the order of reference, and if in that order of reference there is an implied agreement that further evidence is not to be put forward by the parties and that the parties have sufficiently and completely stated their case, the award cannot be invalid because the arbitrators did not give notice that they were prepared to receive evidence. Krottapalli Gopalan v. Myneni Suryanarayana (1) was decided on a different point. In that case the arbitrators had taken evidence, but in their award they ignored the evidence completely and purported to decide the case, not on the evidence, but on their own knowledge. One of them in fact purported to have decided not even on his own knowledge, but on information given him by two of the other arbitrators. Obviously that case is quite different from the present in which the parties when making the reference set out that they had already represented before the arbitrators what each of them had to say, and then directed the arbitrators to make the award, stating that they had given them full power to do so. We think there is no substance in the first point.

The second point is that the arbitrators did not all meet together on all occasions to discuss the award and that they did not all take part in the decision and the final judgment. We do not think that the evidence to which our attention has been called establishes this proposition. It is pointed out that some arbitrators say that they met two or three times, and some other arbitrators say that they met 5 or 6 times, but whether a real discussion of the question went on at these meetings, at which all the arbitrators were not present, is not made clear. It may be that the arbitrators who were present, finding that the others were absent, postponed the discussion until all the arbitrators were present. It is clear from the evidence that the final decision was come to a day shortly before the award was written in the presence of all the five arbitrators. Some stress was laid upon a statement by P. W. No. 4 that he did not "take part in the decision" he being one of the arbitrators. But the same witness also says that "we as a body of arbitrators commenced to decide the matter in the day time". He was not asked to reconcile these two statements, nor was his attention pointedly drawn to this apparent inconsistency. He further says that the award was read over to him after it was written, and he approved of it. We think that the evidence in the case justifies the learned Judge's conclusion that nothing in the evidence shows or suggests that any of the arbitrators surrendered his conscience or his judgment:

We, therefore, see no reason to interfere and we dismiss this appeal with costs.

There can be no abatement of a suit under O. XXI, rr. 3 and 4, Civil Procedure Code, after a preliminary decree has been passed.

There can be no question of the surviving of a cause of action in a suit when a judgment has been pronounced in respect of that cause of action. By the effect of the judgment the decree takes the place of the cause of action either by affirming it or by rejecting it.

Appeal against a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Partabgarh, dated the 24th January, 1927 upholding that of the Munsif, Kunda, at Partabgarh, dated the 31st July, 1926.

Messrs. Niamat Ullah and Ali Zaheer, for the Appellants.

Mr. Radha Krishna, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Kalu Ram and Sri Nath instituted a suit on the 19th February, 1923, against Sitla Din and Musammatt Rajwanti on the basis of a deed of mortgage. They obtained a preliminary decree on the 5th September, 1923. On the 18 July, 1924, Sitla Din died. In October, 1925, Sri Nath died. On the 4th March, 1926, Kalu Ram and the representatives in interest of the deceased Sri Nath applied for a final decree and at the same time applied that the names of the representatives in interest of the deceased Sitla Din should be substituted for the name of Sitla Din. The Courts below have treated the matter as covered by the provisions of O. XXII, rr. 3 and 4 and have held that the right of the plaintiff has abated. The present appeal is filed.

There is very little to be said in this matter as almost a similar case was decided by a Bench of this Court on the 26th February, 1927, [Lakhpai Kuer v. Daulat Singh (1)]. The decision of the learned Subordinate Judge in appeal was passed on the 24th January, 1927, and it was thus not possible for him to know the view which was taken subsequently by the Bench of this Court. In that decision it was laid down that O. XXII, r. 4 did not govern such proceedings. It follows that O. XXII, r. 3 would also not govern such proceedings. It was determined in that case that there can be no question of the surviving of a cause of action in a suit when a judgment has been pronounced in respect of that cause of action. By the effect of the judgment the decree takes the place of the cause of action either by affirming it or by rejecting it. According to the provisions of O. XXII, r. 6 no abatement takes place by reason of the death of either party between the conclusion of the hearing and the pronouncement of the judgment. This rule limits the meaning of the word "suit" to the conclusion of the hearing of the suit. In that appeal attention was drawn to the fact that if a suit was held to abate after the passing of a preliminary decree the effect would be that the preliminary decree would be set aside and in that connection it was pointed out that under a recent decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Lachmi Narayan Marwary v. Balmakund Marwary (2), their Lordships have stated that after a decree has once been made in a suit the only method of avoiding that decree is by its reversal on appeal. Of course the decree might become incapable of execution for failure to execute it within the period prescribed by law, but if the argument which found favour with the lower Courts were accepted, the preliminary decree of 5th September, 1923, would be set aside otherwise than by reversal on appeal while there was still a period within which it could be given effect to. We have heard the arguments of the learned Counsel for the respondents. He has not been able to satisfy us that there is any reason why we should take a view contrary to the view taken in Lakhpatti Kuer v. Daulat Singh (1). Had he been able to persuade us that the view taken in that appeal was not the correct view, we should have referred the point to a Full Bench. But as we accept the statement of the law taken in the previous case we allow the appeal. The result is that the Court will dispose of the application for final decree in the manner required by law upon the merits. The respondents Gaya Din and Musammat Rajwanti will pay their own costs relating to this matter and those of the appellants in this Court and the Courts below.

The absence of an express prayer to set aside the sale does not render an application under O. XXI, r. 89 of the Civil Procedure Code incompetent.

Tipangavda v. Ramangavda (1) and Raoji Baburao v. Bansilal Narayan (2), distinguished.

An execution sale is not complete until the bid is accepted and the deposit of 25 per cent. is made. The limitation of 30 days for setting aside the sale, therefore, begins to run from the date of the acceptance of bid and deposit of 25 per cent. and not from the date when the sale was actually held.

ORDER.—I am of opinion in this case that the orders of the lower Courts are improper ones. The learned District Judge, on the authority of Tipangavda v. Ramangavda (1) and Raoji Baburao v. Bansilal Narayan (2) has held that the application, dated 3rd September, 1926, apparently presented to the Court on 4th September, 1926, could not be held to amount to an application for setting aside the sale. In

Raoji Baburao v. Bansilal Narayan (2) quoted, there was apparently a mere deposit without application, a receipt being obtained from the Nazir. In Tipangavda v. Ramangavda (1) quoted, no application to, or communication with, the Civil Court was made. Here, the application was presented in the Court and there can be no question whatever but that it was in effect intended to be an application under r. 89 of O. XXI, Civil Procedure Code, although, in the terms thereof, there was no express prayer for the setting aside of the sale. The Reader's report shows that it was, however, supposed and presumed to be such and the application in question was duly signed by the Subordinate Judge.

It is true that the report of the Reader on the back of the application is not necessarily authoritative but that report stated that the application was one for the setting aside of the sale. Although this was not so, having regard to the actual phraseology of the application, it was treated as such by the Subordinate Judge who signed the report and allowed the money to be deposited. In those circumstances, I am unable to concur with the lower Courts that the application was not, in effect, one for the setting aside of the sale. In view of its purport and terms, this was precisely what it was and it could indeed have been nothing else. On any reasonable construction of the document, therefore, it must be held that there was an application on 4th September, 1926, for the setting aside of the sale, and it is not disputed that the applicant had made the necessary deposit therewith, as required by r. 89 of O. XXI, Civil Procedure Code.

The next point, which arises for decision, is whether the application of 4th September, 1926, was made within 30 days of the sale. On that point, I am of opinion, that limitation ran not from 3rd August, 1926, but from 5th August, 1926. The bid was only accepted on 5th August, 1926, and, having regard to the terms of r. 84 of O. XXI, I do not think the sale can be said to have been completed until the bid had been accepted and the deposit of 25 per cent. had been made. So long as the bid was not accepted, it is impossible to say, in my opinion, that the sale was completed.

It follows, therefore, in my opinion that the Judge of the first Court was not entitled to confirm the sale; the order of 13th

November, 1926, passed by the Subordinate Judge is reversed and the Execution Case No. 187 of 1925 is remanded to his Court for disposal according to law in accordance with the above remarks. The present applicants' costs in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court will be borne by the non-applicant-decree-holder. I fix Rs. 15 as Pleader's fees.

COUNCIL BY ITS CHAIRMAN—

DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Madras District Municipalities Act. (V of 1920), s. 92—Companies tax—Del credere commission agent of Company—Liability to pay tax—Del credere agent and independent contractor, distinction between.

A firm of merchants were appointed sole "banyans" of a Company for a period of 30 years to sell all goods manufactured or produced by the Company at such prices as shall be approved by, or on behalf of, the Company, and to be responsible to the Company for the due payment by the buyers of the prices of all such goods and merchandise sold by them for and on behalf of the Company, and for the due performance by the buyers of all contracts entered into by them through the said banyans with regard to such goods and merchandise. It was also provided that the price of goods was to be paid to the Company in a period of 1½ months from date of sale and in default the firm was to pay interest. They were also to assist the Company in procuring cotton. In lieu of all this they were to get certain commission from the Company.

Held, that the firm were agents of the Company for the sale of goods on terms of "del credere commission," that there was no relationship of vendor and purchaser between the firm and the Company, and that the firm was, therefore, bound to pay tax under s. 92 of the Madras District Municipalities Act.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Tinnevely, in A. S. No. 215 of 1924 (A. S. No. 349 of 1924 on the file of the District Court) preferred against that of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Tinnevely, in O. S. No. 435 of 1922.

Mr. T. M. Ramasami Iyer, for the Appellants.

Mr. S. T. Srinivasa Gopalachari, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The appellants are a firm styled Sri Vilas. They have been assessed to pay the Companies tax under s. 92 of the District Municipality Act as agents of the Tinnevely Textiles Co. Ltd. The question for decision is whether they are employed by that Company as agents to represent it for the purpose of transacting business in the Tinnevely Municipality. The Courts below have found that they are so employed. Their contention is that they are, as stated in para. 8 of the plaint "independent contractors." in other words, that the relations between them and the Company are those of buyer and seller.

The answer to the question turns on the construction of the agreement between the parties Ex. IV. Under that agreement the appellants were appointed sole "banyans" of the Company for a period of 30 years. They were (cl. II) "to sell all goods manufactured or produced by the Company at such prices as shall be approved by or on behalf of the Company" and to be "responsible to the Company for the due payment by the buyers of the prices of all such goods and merchandise sold by them for and on behalf of the Company and for the due performance by the buyers of all contracts entered into by them through the said banyans with regard to such goods and merchandise." By cl. III the prices of goods sold were to be paid to the Company in 1½ months from the date of the sales and in default the appellants were to pay interest. By cl. IV the appellants were bound to assist the Company in procuring cotton at the market rates and be responsible to the Company for the due performance of all contracts entered into with the Company through them for the supply of cotton. By cl. V the rates of commission were fixed. By cls. VI and XI arrangements were made by the parties for mutual inspection of accounts. By cl. VII the Company had to bear the cost of carrying the goods from their mills to the appellant's depôts. By cl. IX the Company had to pay Rs. 150 a month to the appellants for their Tinnevely Depôt.

The only evidence as to the course of dealing between the Company and the appellants comes from a clerk employed by the latter. One admission by him is significant; it is that "yarn is sold to people here on the responsibility of Sri Vilas." In other words, the yarn sold is the property of the Company and sold by it, the appellants merely guaranteeing the purchasers. In the face of this admission and of the terms of the agreement, it seems to us idle to contend that the appellants are, as they describe themselves 'independent dealers.' As pointed out by Jessel, M. R., in Ex parte Bright, In re Smith (1) the fact that the agents are to be liable for the purchasers of the goods paying the money is "wholly inconsistent with the notion that they were the real purchasers, for then they would be guaranteeing themselves, they would be personally liable to pay as purchasers and what would be the use of guaranteeing payment by themselves? The real position is that the appellants were the Company's agents, that the goods transmitted to and sold by them were the goods of the Company and that they had no independence of action. The prices were fixed by the Company and the contracts were made with them through the appellants. We think that the Courts below were perfectly right in finding that the appellants were employed by the Company to represent it for the purpose of transacting business at Tinnevely. They were not customers or commission agents of the Company. No doubt they earned a commission but it was what is known as a "del credere commission". They were in fact agents of the Company for the sale of their goods. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Although the prayers in a plaint are worded in the form of mere declarations, yet, where some of them are really of a consequential nature, the plaintiff is bound to pay ad valorem fee on the plaint.

Taraprasanna Chongdar v. Nrisinha Murari Pal (1), followed.

Where a plaint as well as the memorandum of appeal filed by a plaintiff are found to be insufficiently stamped, the proper course to be followed by the Appellate Court is to direct that the appeal be registered on the appellant supplying the deficit Court-fees as regards his memorandum of appeal, and after the appeal has been registered and before it has been dealt with under O. XLI, r. 11, Civil Procedure Code, to place the case for orders under s. 12, sub-s. (ii) of the Court Fees Act as regards the deficit Court-fees on the plaint in the lower Court.

It is not necessary for the application of s. 12, sub-s. (ii) of the Court Fees Act that there should have been a formal decision on the question of sufficiency of Court-fees.

Shama Soondary v. Hurro Soondary (2), followed.

Provisions of s. 10 (ii) of the Court Fees Act are mandatory and the power conferred by this provision of law may be exercised at any time so long as the suit remains before the Court on appeal.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Birbhum, dated the 10th March, 1926, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Suri, dated the 7th March, 1924.

Messrs. Manmatha Nath Roy and Surjya Kumar Aich, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—We have examined the prayers in the plaint and we are of opinion that although they have been worded as embodying reliefs which on the face of them appear to be of a declaratory nature, two at least of these reliefs are really consequential ones. We are of opinion that the reason of the decision of this Court in the case of Taraprasanna Chongdar v. Nrisinha Murari Pal (1) fully applies to the present case, and the Registrar is right in the view he has taken, namely, that ad valorem Court-fees must be paid on the memorandum of appeal. He is also right in holding that the Court-fees paid on the plaint as well as on the memorandum of appeal which the plaintiff filed in the lower Appellate Court were insufficient.

Then, a question has been raised in view of s. 28 of the Court Fees Act as to the propriety of the Registrar's order calling upon the appellant to pay the deficit Court-fees on the plaint and on the plaintiff's memorandum of appeal to the lower Appellate Court. It has been argued that there has been no reception or use in this Court of the aforesaid documents yet and, therefore, an order for their stamping with the requisite Court-fees cannot be passed; in other words, it is said that if and when the appeal is heard and these documents are sought to be used, and not till then, can an order of this description be made.

This contention seems reasonable enough, and were s. 28 of the Court Fees Act the only section that was applicable to the present case we would have been prepared to give effect to it. The present case, however, is one in which a plaintiff who has been unsuccessful in both the Courts below has preferred this appeal. There is another provision of the Act which is applicable, and more directly applicable, to this case and that is sub-s. (ii) of s. 12. It is not necessary for the application of this sub-section that there should have been a formal decision on the question of sufficiency of the Court-fees: [Shama Soondary v. Hurro Soondary (2)]. Under this sub-section the plaintiff-appellant may be called upon to pay the requisite additional Court-fees on the aforesaid documents, and on his failure to pay the same within such time as the Court shall fix, the Court is bound to dismiss the suit under s. 10, sub-s. (ii). For the adoption of this course by this Court it is necessary that the suit should have come before this Court, which evidently means that the appeal should have been registered, because not till the appeal has been registered in this Court can it properly be said that the suit has come before this Court. This course is mandatory and the power conferred by this provision of the law may be exercised at any time so long as the suit remains before this Court on appeal. The proper order to pass in the present case, therefore, is to direct that the appeal should be registered on the appellant supplying the deficit Court-fees as regards his memorandum of appeal to this Court. After the appeal has been registered and before it is dealt with under O. XLI, r. 11, Civil Procedure Code, it should be placed before the Court for proper orders being passed under s. 12, sub-s. (ii) of the Court Fees Act.

On the appellant's prayer we allow him further time till 3rd January, 1927, to put in the deficit Court-fees for his memorandum of appeal to this Court but it must be understood that he must put the same in by that date, and in default thereof the appeal will stand rejected.

PARMA NAND—CONVICT—APPELLANT

versus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 409—Criminal breach of trust concerning public moneys—Sentence.

An offence of criminal breach of trust by a person in charge of public moneys is one of a specially serious nature and calls for a severe sentence.

Criminal appeal from the order of the Additional District Magistrate, Lahore, dated the 1st July, 1927.

Mr. Ram Lal Anand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Raj Krishna for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant has been convicted under the provisions of s. 409 of the Indian Penal Code of criminal breach of trust in connection with the disappearance of a sum of Rs. 50,000 from the Pattoki Branch of the Allahabad Bank. He has been sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment and to pay a fine of Rs. 5,000 and in default to undergo a further eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment.

The evidence in this case, which has been elaborately discussed by the learned Additional District Magistrate, leaves no shadow of doubt that the appellant is responsible for the disappearance of this sum of money from the Bank of Pattoki. It has been established by witnesses whose credibility has been in no way shaken and most of whom are quite disinterested, that the appellant gave as his version of the disappearance of this money that three men had come to the Bank while he alone was present and asked for change for notes, and, as he was taking the money from the strong room, one of them presented a revolver at him, while the other chloroformed him. They then robbed the strong room of Rs. 50,000 and left after having locked the strong room door on the outside. On the morning in question the clerk-in-charge states that he had left the Bank to attend certain religious ceremonies and to have his breakfast and, that on his return at about 11 A. M. he found that the appellant was missing. He thereupon instructed the chaprasi to go and find him. Both the chaprasi and two chaukidars who were subsequently called for the same purpose, went in search but were unable to find him. Ultimately about 4 P. M. the attention of the clerk-in-charge was directed by the chaprasi to a sound coming from the strong room. On opening the strong room door the appellant was found who thereupon gave the version of what had happened to him as narrated above.

As the story told by the appellant was somewhat improbable he was arrested on the following day upon suspicion. Three days afterwards a key of the strong room was found amongst some flowers at a distance of 12 feet from the strong room window. It has been proved that a person inside the strong room could without any difficulty lock the door from the outside. The key which was found in the bed of flowers fitted the strong room lock. The appellant told Dr. Ganpat Rai (P. W. No. 13) that he had been drugged and was unconscious for six hours, that on his pointing out to him that no person could remain unconscious for six hours from any known anæsthetic he stated that he would alter his version in this matter later on. In his written statement he now says that he was attacked and rendered unconscious by three strangers at 2 P. M. and remained unconscious until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. He denies that he ever told anybody that he remained unconscious for a longer time.

I may say, having been taken through the evidence which has been subjected to keen criticism by Mr. Ram Lal who appears for the appellant, that I am in entire agreement with the conclusion arrived at by the learned trial Magistrate and with the reasons which he has given for coming to that conclusion. There can be no doubt at all that the appellant was responsible for the removal of the sum of Rs. 50,000 from the strong room of the Allahabad Bank at Pattoki.

Mr. Ram Lal has urged that the sentence is too severe. This, however, is a very serious kind of offence. The law always regards the offence of criminal breach of trust by persons-in-charge of public moneys as one of a specially serious nature. I find myself unable to take a more lenient view of this offence than has been taken by the learned trial Magistrate and accordingly I dismiss the appeal.

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 23 OF 1927.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 147, 149, 325, 352
—Conviction and sentence for offences under ss. 325 and 352—Acquittal under s. 325—Sentence, whether must be reduced—Offence under s. 147, whether necessarily embraces one under s. 352.

Where an accused person is convicted of an offence under s. 325 and also under s. 352 read with s. 149, Indian Penal Code, but on appeal the conviction under s. 325 is set aside, the sentence must be reduced.

It cannot be said that an offence under s. 147 necessarily embraces an offence under s. 352, inasmuch as persons may riot without actually committing an offence under s. 352.

Petition under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of Session of the Coimbatore Division, in Criminal Appeals Nos. 101 and 115 of 1926, preferred against the judgment of the Court of the Assistant Sessions
Judge, Coimbatore Division, in S. C. Nos.
95 and 104 of 1926 respectively.

FACTS.—The accused were charged before the Assistant Sessions Judge, Coimbatore, of the offences of rioting, grievous hurt, dacoity, abduction with intent to confine and wrongful confinement.

The Jury held that the accused were not guilty of dacoity. The Assistant Sessions Judge accepted this verdict and found the accused guilty of rioting, grievous hurt, abduction with intent not under s. 365 but only under s. 352 read with
s. 149; wrongful confinement was negatived.

Accordingly the accused were convicted of offences under s. 325, Indian Penal Code, and under ss. 147 and 352 read with
s. 149 and sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment for the former offence and two years for the latter offences.

Accused Nos. 2, 3, 4, 7, 9, 10 and 12 were convicted under s. 147 read with
s. 345 and under s. 352 read with s. 149, and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment.

The 13th accused was convicted of offences under ss. 147, 325 and 352 read with s. 149 and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment.

On appeal the Sessions Judge held that none of the accused could be convicted under s. 325 but confirmed the sentence on all.

Against this, a criminal revision petition was filed.

Mr. K. S. Jayarama Ayyar for Mr. S.
Ramachandra Ayyar, for the Petitioners.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—Three points are raised:—

(1) That having eliminated s. 325, Indian Penal Code, the learned Sessions Judge should have reduced the sentences accordingly. The Public Prosecutor concedes that the three years under s. 325 should give place to two years under s. 352 as set forth in para. 11 of the Assistant Sessions
Judge's judgment as regards accused
No. 1.

As regards the other accused Nos. 3, 4, 7, 9, 10 and 12 now that they are acquitted under s. 325 their culpability seems to be less and their sentence is reduced to nine months' rigorous imprisonment; and that of the 13th accused to one year and nine months and fine.

(2) The charge against accused No. 6 that he was member of this unlawful assembly on October 30th is an illegality vitiating the whole trial. It is a question of fact, not of law. The trial Court found that the charge was unsubstantiated; and acquitted him. If the facts as charged had been proved there would have been no illegality.

(3) It is urged that s. 352 cannot be coupled with s. 147, because the latter necessarily embraces the former.

Persons may riot without actually committing an offence under s. 352 and this theory that one section embraces the other is fallacious.

The petition is dismissed except as indicated above.

COMPLAINANT—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 403—Autrefois acquit—Subsequent prosecution on facts different from those of previous prosecution—Acquittal on charge under s. 498, Penal Code—Prosecution for subsequent detention, whether barred.

Where the prosecution of an accused rests on facts wholly and completely different from those on which he was previously prosecuted, the principle of autrefois acquit cannot be invoked.

The previous acquittal of an accused on a charge under s. 498, Penal Code, is not a bar to subsequent proceedings under the same section on a charge of subsequent detention of the same woman.

Petition for revision of the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Hoshiarpur, dated the 16th July, 1927, modifying that of the Magistrate, First Class, Hoshiarpur, dated the 14th June, 1927.

Mr. H. J. Rustonji, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Dhanpat Rai, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Waryam Singh has been found guilty under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced in the first instance to nine months' rigorous imprisonment. On appeal to the Additional Sessions Judge, this sentence has been reduced to six months. He has applied for revision, and the chief point urged by Counsel, is that for all practical purposes he has been twice tried for the same offence, and that on the principle of autrefois acquit the conviction should now be quashed.

As pointed out by the learned Sessions Judge, the section is the same in both trials, but the facts on which the prosecution rests, are wholly and completely different. In the first case it was the brother of the husband who instituted a complaint against the present accused on the ground of his having enticed away the woman and thereby committed an offence under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code. The records of the previous case have been burnt but there can be no doubt that this is what happened; and even if the more favourable view were taken that he was charged under the second part of s. 498 not of enticing away the woman but of detaining her, the earlier acquittal on that charge would not act, in my opinion, as a bar to subsequent proceedings sixteen years later on a charge of subsequent detention.

Both the complainant and the accused are soldiers and on the former's return from service he instituted proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights in a Civil Court in the year 1922. These proceedings went on till 1925, and in 1926 he having failed to get redress, although he had obtained a decree, he took action under the Indian Penal Code for the second time. I agree, throughout with the finding of the Sessions Judge that there is no question of a man being tried for the same offence and the conviction is perfectly good in law.

Counsel has drawn my attention to the fact that the woman on her own showing led a most immoral life before 1916. This has been taken into account by the Sessions Judge in awarding the sentence. He has also urged that whatever has been done has been done quite openly and that the accused and the woman have been living together as husband and wife. It appears to me that the offence is aggravated by the failure of the accused to submit himself to the decision of the Civil Court and to send back the woman after a decree had been passed. He is a young man of 28 years of age and a trumpeter in his regiment and in addition to the punishment awarded, he will be dismissed from service if a sentence of more than three months stand against him. I dismiss the application for revision but reduce the sentence of imprisonment to the amount of imprisonment already undergone, and a fine of Rs. 100 to be paid to the complainant, if realised, and in the event of failure to pay the fine a further term of one month's imprisonment.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 820 OF 1927.

November 8, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Coldstream.MOHAMMED HUSSAIN alias FAJJA—*CONVICT—APPELLANTversusEMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 75, 448, 511—S. 75, whether applies to attempts—House trespass, what constitutes—Entry, necessity of.

The accused with intent to commit house-breaking stepped on the platform in front of a door, but were disturbed and captured as soon as they had opened the door, before they had effected an entry.

Held, that the accused were not guilty of house-breaking but only of an attempt to commit house-breaking. [p. 341, col. 1.]

Section 75, Penal Code, does not apply to attempts punishable under s. 511 of the Code. [ibid.]

Criminal appeal from an order of the District Magistrate, Gujrat, dated the 25th June, 1927.

JUDGMENT.—I dispose of in this order the two appeals submitted through the Jail Authorities by Fajja alias Mohammed Hussain (Criminal Appeal No. 820 of 1927) and Ishar Das (Criminal Appeal No. 1003 of 1927). The two appellants were convicted at one trial by the District Magistrate of Gujrat, and sentenced under s. 457 read with s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code, Fajja to transportation for seven years and Ishar Das to three years' rigorous imprisonment. The story for the prosecution was as follows:—

Shortly after mid-night on the 21st of April, 1917, Chuni Lal (P.W. No. 1), a shop-keeper of Kacha Bazar in Pindi Baha-ud-Din, Notified Area, who had closed his shop at 8 or 8-30 in the evening leaving a lamp burning in his shop, was returning to his shop from his house after his evening meal in company with Kundan Lal (P.W. No. 2) a neighbouring shop-keeper. On approaching Chuni Lal's shop the two men heard a noise like that of the door being opened and Chuni Lal shouted "Who is there?" The two appellants were seen standing close to the door-way of the shop behind the curtain which covered the shop front. On raising a shout of thief Chuni Lal and Kundan Lal grappled with and secured Fajja in the verandah of the shop. They recognised him as Fajja, who had a shop opposite to Chuni Lal's. Meanwhile the other trespasser who turned out to be Ishar Das had been captured by Hans Raj (P.W. No. 3) and Daffadar Ishar Singh (P.W.

No. 4) both of whom had heard Chuni Lal's cries of thief and had seen Ishar Das coming out from behind the awning. Inside the verandah in front of the shop-door were found the lock of the door in a broken condition, an iron rod, and another instrument described as a darning needle. At the trial Fajja denied that he had been arrested as alleged by the witnesses and declared that he was innocently sleeping in his own shop when he was arrested about 8 o'clock in the evening by Daffadar Ishar Singh, Chaudhari Ladha Ram and about one hundred and fifty other persons. He had not broken the lock of Chuni Lal's shop. Ishar Das also declared his innocence stating that he was returning to the bazar from the Railway station at 8 o'clock in the evening and was watching a burning shop near Chuni Lal's shop when he was suddenly arrested for no particular reason. Fajja produced some Muhammadan witnesses to prove that there was a fire in a shop close to Chuni Lal's shop and that Daffadar Ishar Singh and others went to Fajja's shop and asked him to sold some tins but Fajja refused saying that he was ill and unable to move, thereupon he was forcibly removed to the Chauk where Chuni Lal accused Fajja of house-breaking. The District Magistrate accepting the prosecution evidence and holding the defence evidence to be false sentenced the appellants as stated in the beginning of this judgment.

I have read the record and have no hesitation in agreeing with the learned District Magistrate in finding that the defence evidence is entirely fabricated and that the story for the prosecution as set forth in the evidence of Chuni Lal, Kundan Lal, Ishar Singh and Hans Raj is true. The discrepancies in the evidence are immaterial and have been adequately discussed and disposed of by the learned District Magistrate. There is also the evidence of Ladha Ram, the Chaudhari (P.W. No. 6) before whom the appellants were produced by their captors; that the appellants asked to be pardoned Fajja pleading that he would get a heavy sentence as a previous convict and Ishar Das that he had acted at the instance of Fajja. The only question is what offence has been proved against them. There is no doubt that both the appellants went to Chuni Lal's shop with the common intention of breaking into it.

It is doubtful whether there was house trespass, for apparently the appellants did no more than step on to the platform in front of the door.

House-breaking cannot be committed without entry. There is no proof of entry; indeed the evidence throughout indicates that there was none. The appellants were disturbed as soon as they had opened the door, nothing was stolen, the lock and the implements carried by the appellants were lying outside and the door opened outwards. The offence committed, was an attempt to commit house-breaking by night with the intention to commit theft punishable under ss. 511, 457, Indian Penal Code, with seven years' rigorous imprisonment. Section 75, Indian Penal Code, does not apply to attempts punishable under s. 511. It follows that in imposing the penalty in this case the previous convictions must be ignored. The maximum sentence which the appellants could have received from a First Class Magistrate, who would ordinarily have tried them had they not been previous convicts will, I think, be proper in the circumstances.

Accepting the appeal I alter the section under which Fajja and Ishar Das have been convicted to s. 511 read with s. 457, Indian Penal Code, and reduce the sentences to two years' rigorous imprisonment in each case.

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 187 OF 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Waller and

In re ABBAS ALI SAHIB AND ANOTHER—ACCUSED NOS. 3 AND 1—PETITIONERS.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 391—Trial by Jury—Three named men charged with dacoity along with two other unknown men—Acquittal of one accused on ground of insufficient identification—Conviction of other two for dacoity, legality of—Duty of Court to direct Jury to possible results of such acquittal.

Three known and named persons were charged with dacoity along with two other unknown men. The Jury acquitted one of the three accused and convicted the other two of the offence with which they had been charged:

Held, (1) that it was quite open to the Jury, while holding that one of the accused who was supposed to have been known to the witnesses had not been properly identified, to find that the total number of dacoits was five; [p. 341, col. 2.]

(2) but that the Judge should have asked the Jury definitely whether they had considered the possible result of the acquittal and whether they still found that the number of robbers was five, since it was possible that if the questions had been put, the remaining two accused would have been found guilty only of robbery and received lighter sentences. [p. 342, col. 1.]

Petition under ss. 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of Session of the Madura Division, in Criminal Appeals Nos. 2 and 7 of 1927 preferred against the judgment of the Court of the Assistant Sessions Judge, Madura, in S. O. No. 88 of 1926.

Mr. F. S. Vaz, for the Petitioners.3

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—The main question raised is this. Three known and named persons were charged with dacoity along with two other unknown men. The Jury acquitted one of the three accused and convicted the other two of the offence with which they had been charged. Mr. Vaz argues that the conviction is illegal as the Jury had no jurisdiction to substitute for a man known and named one who was unknown. We are not prepared to go that length. We think that it was quite open to the Jury, while holding that one of the accused who was supposed to have been known to the witnesses had not been properly identified, to find that the total number of dacoits was five. At the same time we are of opinion that when they acquitted the 2nd accused, the Judge should have asked them definitely whether they had considered the possible result of the acquittal and whether they still found that the number of robbers was five. Nothing of the sort was however done and it is impossible to say what the finding of the Jury would have been had those questions been put to them. It is not at all unlikely that the petitioners before us would have been found guilty only of robbery and received much lighter sentences.

The convictions must be set aside. We, however, see no necessity to direct a re-trial. The petitioners have been in Jail for several months a quite adequate punishment for what appears to have been no more than a drunken brawl. The petitioners will be released from custody.

CRIMINAL MISCELLANEOUS APPLICATION
No. 183 of 1926.

December 17, 1926.

Present :—Mr. Justice Harrison.

SAI—ACCUSED—PETITIONER

versus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 439, 476-A—Criminal trial—Accused's right, to trial by Judge with open mind—Hearing of case on appeal by Judge who made complaint under s. 476-A, whether legal—Prosecution for contradictory statements—Failure to draw up alternative charge—Order for re-trial on same charge, legality of.

The accused made a statement before a Sessions Judge which contradicted a previous statement made by him and the Sessions Judge made a complaint to the District Magistrate under s. 476-A, Criminal Procedure Code, in which he stated that the last statement made by the accused was false. The accused was tried by a Magistrate on this charge and convicted. On appeal, the same Sessions Judge, without ordering the framing of an alternative charge, ordered re-trial on the same charge as he found that there was no evidence to show that the last statement was false. The accused applied for transfer of the case:

Held, (1) that the proceedings against the accused must be quashed inasmuch as the complainant and the Appellate Court were one and the same. [p. 343, col. 2.]

(2) that the accused should not be submitted to a fresh trial inasmuch as the principle of nemo debet bis vexari applied to the case in the spirit if not in the letter. [ibid.]

An accused is entitled to a decision both in the trial Court and on appeal from a Judge who approaches his case with an absolutely open mind. [p. 343, col. 1.]

Application for transfer of the case from the Court of the Additional District Magistrate, Shahpur, at Sargodha, to some other competent Court.

Sheikh Niaz Muhammad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Ram Lal, Assistant Legal Remembrancer, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—This is an application for transfer. It does not disclose the real flaw in the proceedings. The facts are briefly that in a s. 304 case, in which Maulu absconder was tried and eventually convicted, his appeal being dismissed by the High Court, one Sai gave evidence to the effect that a man named Maulu was one of the assailants but that it was not the Maulu before the Court but a man of different parentage. In the first and second trials, therefore, this man Sai had named one Maulu as one of the assailants, but gave his father's name as Amir on one occasion and Muhammad on the other. This contradicted his previous statement and the Sessions Judge took action and sent a complaint to the District Magistrate under s. 476-A of the Criminal Procedure Code. In this it was stated that the last statement of Sai accused "was decidedly false and was deliberately made with a view to help Maulu, son of Amir, in the case under s. 304, Indian Penal Code." The eighth paragraph of the complaint runs as follows:—"That as Sai has given false evidence in the Court of Mr. Vishnu Bhagwan in his statement, dated 2nd December, 1924, (i. e., his statement in the last trial) he is guilty of an offence under s. 193, Indian Penal Code." A list of witnesses was sent with the complaint. The case was entrusted to Mr. Daulat Ram, Budhwar, by the District Magistrate. He proceeded to examine the witnesses, framed a charge to the effect that the last statement was false, and eventually convicted the accused and sentenced him to four years' rigorous imprisonment. On appeal the learned Sessions Judge wrote an order to the effect that the Magistrate had relied on the finding of the Sessions Court and the High Court in the previous trial, and that there was no data on the present record for a finding as to which of the two statements made by the accused was false. The judgment goes on: "Possibly if the Magistrate had framed an alternative charge that one or the other of the two statements of the accused was false, there would have been some reason for the conviction, but as the charge and the record stand at present, there is not an iota of evidence to substantiate the charge." The Sessions Judge, therefore, accepted the appeal, set aside the conviction and directed that Sai should be re-tried. Sai applied for transfer to the District Magistrate on the ground that Mr. Daulat Ram, Budhwar, had already made up his mind, and I think it would have been well had the District Magistrate granted his prayer. Sai did not then nor even when applying to this Court take the ground that the same officer was the complainant and the Appellate Court. He now applies for revision of the District Magistrate's order. I propose to deal with the matter on the ground, which has not been raised, namely, that it is impossible to allow the same Judge or the same Magistrate to be the complainant and the Court.

It is urged and truly that the Sessions Judge's order is in favour of the accused in the sense that it gives him another chance though a very poor one. It is not on the ground that the Sessions Judge is in any way biased that I take exception to the procedure, but merely on the ground of his identity with, or rather his being, the complainant. He must have believed that the accused had committed an offence or it would have been wholly impossible for him to lodge a complaint. The accused is entitled to a decision both in the trial Court and on appeal from a Judge who approaches his case with an absolutely open mind.

There is a further objection that the real trouble in this case is that the charge was not in the alternative, and the reason why the charge was not in the alternative was that the complaint was not in the alternative for it definitely stated that the last statement of the accused was false and asked for a decision on this point and on this point alone. Naturally enough the Magistrate, even, if he noticed the defect in the complaint presented by his superior officer, did not draw any attention to it, and proceeded to try that complaint as lodged and to hear the witnesses, whom he had been directed to hear. The Sessions Judge now realises apparently that the form in which he drew up the complaint was wrong. He does not order a fresh charge in the alternative, which would require no further evidence at all, but perseveres in the matter, asking for a conviction on a finding that the last statement is untrue, and directs the Magistrate to re-hear the whole of the material evidence in the s. 304 case and to come to a decision on the point, which has been decided both by the Sessions Judge and by the High Court, and not to allow himself to be influenced in any way by those previous decisions.

To say the least of it, this would necessitate an enormous amount of unnecessary labour, and a terrible waste of time. The District Magistrate has complained of the expense already incurred in this case and that expense would be very much increased if the order of the Sessions Judge were carried out. This, however, is no sufficient ground for interference. The reasons why I think the proceedings must be quashed and not re-opened are: (1) that the complainant and the Appellate Court are one and the same; and (2) that I do not think it right that the accused should have to submit to a fresh trial because the initial mistake was made of not framing the charge in the alternative. It would not be illegal but I think most inadvisable to allow such a fresh trial and the principle of nemo debet bis vexari applies in the spirit if not in the letter. The accused has undergone one month's imprisonment and a great deal of trouble and anxiety and also considerable expense, and I think he has been punished enough for any offence he may have committed.

I accept the application and quash the proceedings.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 208 OF 1927.

August 19, 1927.

Present:—Mr. Justice Jackson and Mr. Justice Thiruvengkatachariar.

On difference of opinion

Before Mr. Justice Wallace.

In re GUTURI NAGADU—PRISONER—
APPELLANT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 300, Exception 1—Murder and culpable homicide—'Sudden and grave provocation'—Aggressive provocation by deceased—Challenge by accused—Subsequent provocation by deceased—Fatal blow by accused—Offence, whether murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

In the course of a quarrel between the party of the accused and that of the deceased, the deceased came out of his house shouting for the accused. The accused who was then standing near a tree in front of his house near by abused in return and defied the deceased and told him to come on. The deceased then caught hold of the accused by the tuft and gave him two blows with the fist. There was a struggle and the deceased held the accused firm by the tuft. The accused then gave a fatal blow to the deceased on the left side with a dagger which he had in his hand:

Held, (Per Wallace and Thiruvengkatachariar, JJ.), that though the first provocation of the deceased in calling out for the accused was not grave and sudden, it was aggressive and the second provocation, i.e., seizing the accused by the tuft was grave, and sudden and the stabbing being directly attributable to it, Exception 1 to s. 300 applied to the case and the accused was not guilty of murder but of the lesser offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. [p. 346, col. 2; p. 347, col. 1.]

Per Jackson, J., (dissenting).—When a man defies another and tells him to come on, in brief, challenges him to fight, and a fight ensues, he cannot claim that he has been gravely and suddenly provoked merely because he is getting the worst of it. [p. 344, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Court of Session of the Chittoor Division, in C. C. No. 5 of 1927.

This appeal came on for hearing on 13th July, 1927, after service of notice on the accused, and Counsel not appearing on his behalf upon perusing the petition of appeal and the record of the evidence and proceedings before the Court of Session and upon hearing the arguments of the Public Prosecutor on behalf of the Crown and the case having stood over for consideration till the 28th of July, 1927, the Court (Jackson and Thiruvengkatachariar, JJ.) delivered the following dissenting judgments.

JUDGMENT.

Jackson, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of my learned brother. I entirely agree with the finding of fact, and take up the story from the fatal fight. "The accused who was then standing near the tree abused in return, and defied the deceased and told him to come on. The deceased caught hold of the accused by the tuft and gave him two blows with his fist. There was a struggle and the deceased held accused firm by the tuft. The accused then gave the deceased a blow on the left side with a 'baku' which he had in his hand.

I think that the only exception in s. 300 of the Indian Penal Code possibly applicable to such circumstances is Exception 4...

sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel and without the offender's having taken undue advantage.

When a man defies another and tells him to come on, in brief, challenges him to fight and a fight ensues, he cannot claim that he has been gravely and suddenly provoked merely because he is getting the worst of it. Suppose it is the other way round, and accused after challenging deceased to fight is getting the better of it, is he prepared to concede that at that point deceased may stab him and plead grave provocation? Which ever in such a case stabs is doing exactly what Exception 4 provides against his taking undue advantage, and acting in a cruel manner. Nor can I find that accused bona fide exceeded the right of private defence. He had asked for a fight, and was in no serious danger. I agree with the learned Sessions Judge that the offence is clearly murder and see no reason to interfere.

Thiruvengkatachariar, J.—The appellant in this case has been convicted of the offence of murder and sentenced to transportation for life, the charge against him being that he intentionally caused the death of Kodipatnam Bayya Reddy by stabbing him with a dagger. The appellant denied the charge and said that the case against him was wholly concocted. The learned Sessions Judge agreeing with three of the assessors found the accused guilty. The fourth assessor was of opinion that the accused was not guilty. The appellant in his petition of appeal contests that finding. Upon the evidence there can be hardly any doubt as to the correctness of the learned Judge's finding that the accused stabbed Bayya Reddy with a dagger with intent to cause his death, or I may add at least such bodily injury as was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.

The only question, therefore, which remains to be considered is whether in the circumstances of this case the appellant should be held guilty of the graver offence of murder under s. 302, or of the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s. 394, and in the latter case whether he should be convicted under the first part or the second part of that section. The learned Sessions Judge has considered this question with reference to Exception 2 to s. 300, Indian Penal Code, and his opinion is that the said exception does not apply to this case and that the offence committed by the appellant is murder. The material facts bearing on this question are as follows:—

About ten days prior to the occurrence the deceased discovered that there was criminal intimacy between the accused and the wife of his brother, P. W. No. 4, and that they intended to elope. The deceased and his brother thereupon chastised the latter's wife. Her husband threatened to shoot her and her lover (the accused) if he saw them together. The accused apprehending danger to himself made himself scarce for some days.

The events that immediately preceded the occurrence are set out by the learned Sessions Judge in para. 6 of his judgment. P. W. No. 6 the brother of the wife of P. W. No. 4 had been sent for by the deceased and he came to their house on the morning of the day of the occurrence. After breakfast he went to the house of the accused, referred to as Guturi house and there he was informed by Achamma and Papulu the women of the house that P. W. No. 4 and the deceased were ill-treating his sister P. W. No. 7. P. W. No. 6 came back to his brother-in-law's house and asked the deceased why his sister was beaten to which the latter replied "if she misbehaves in the house is she not to be checked?" P. W. No. 6 said that the husband was the proper person to chastise her and not he. Then the deceased asked P. W. No. 6 who told him that he had beaten and abused his sister. P. W. No. 6 mentioned the names of Achamma and Papulu. The deceased went out of the house and asked those women who were standing in their premises why they carried tales which brought about misunderstanding. There was then an exchange of abuse between the deceased and the said women and the deceased pulled out a stick from the fence and was going to jump out to attack them when his brother P. W. No. 4 came and restrained him. This quarrel took place in the afternoon and then neither the accused nor his father and uncle were in the house. The accused and his father after they came home in the evening heard evidently from their women that the deceased had come to their house and abused them. That put them (accused and his father) in any angry mood and with sticks in their hands they proceeded to the entrance of the deceased's house and challenged him to fight with them for having abused the women. The deceased went out to meet them and presently came back and picked up a bamboo stick. His brother, P. W. No. 4, held him back and asked him to stay in and himself went out saying that he would speak to the accused and his father. In the meantime Chalamiah, the paternal uncle of the accused who was then in the house of P. W. No. 4 also went out and pushed the accused and his father towards their house. When P. W. No. 4 came out into the street the accused's father Narayana attacked him at once with his stick giving him a blow on the shoulder and another on the knee. P. W. No. 4 snatched the stick from him and dealt blows in return. It would appear that in that fight the accused's father Narayana was hurt more than P. W. No. 4. The deceased also came out of the house shouting, where is Nagulugadu? The accused who was then standing near the tree in front of his house abused in return and defied the deceased and told him to come on. What happened afterwards is spoken to by P. Ws. Nos. 4 and 6. The deceased caught hold of the accused by the tuft and gave him two blows with the fist. There was a struggle and the deceased held accused firm by the tuft. The accused then gave a blow to the deceased on the left side with a 'baku' which he had in his hand. The deceased cried out that the accused had stabbed him with a 'baku' and left the accused and went home holding his side with his hand. It would appear that in the struggle the accused also received some injuries which are set out in the wound certificate Ex. C: which, however, were not of a serious nature. The learned Judge observes as follows:—

"The deceased was, therefore, clearly the aggressor, but the evidence shows that he was not armed with any weapon whereas the accused must have already armed himself with a dagger for the fray before his assailant came to attack him."

On that ground the learned Judge holds that Exception 2 to s. 300, Indian Penal Code does not apply. He has not considered whether the case would fall within any of the other exceptions to s. 300. I need scarcely observe that the facts of a case may be such that it may fall within more than one exception to s. 300 and the question, therefore, for consideration in this case is whether the case falls within any and which of the exceptions to s. 300. The deceased in this case having been the aggressor, as found by the learned Judge, the first question is whether Exception 1 to s. 300 does not apply to the case. I have thought it necessary to state the facts at some length as it seems to be clear that the quarrel was provoked by the deceased himself. The accused was standing at a distance in front of his house. He took no part in the quarrel between his father and brother of the deceased. But the deceased went towards the accused challenging him to fight and caught hold of him by his tuft and gave him blows with his fist. There was a struggle between them during which, according to the 6th witness, the deceased held the accused firmly by his tuft, and while he was so being held and had received some injuries the accused stabbed the deceased with the dagger which he had with him. It will be seen that though the accused was armed with a dagger he did not use it immediately the deceased came upon him, but he used it only when the deceased went on beating him without leaving his hold of the tuft. The act of the deceased was highly provocative and it was both grave and sudden and was well calculated to enrage the accused and deprive him of the power of self-control. He found himself suddenly under the grip of his enemy from whom he might have apprehended serious danger to himself. If under these circumstances the accused retaliated and stabbed the deceased with the dagger which he already had, I think he is entitled to the benefit of Exception 1 to s. 300, I may here refer to ill. (F) to this exception which runs as follows:—Z strikes B, B is by this provocation excited to violent rage. A, a by-stander, intending to take advantage of B's rage, and to cause him to kill Z, puts a knife into B's hand for that purpose, B kills Z with the knife. Here B may have committed only culpable homicide but A is guilty of murder.

I do not think that so far as Exception 1 is concerned if the act which resulted in the death was the result of grave and sudden provocation, it makes any difference that the man who was so provoked had a knife already or he was given a knife by a by-stander with which he stabbed his assailant. No doubt, the circumstance that the accused had already provided himself with a knife or dagger is a fact to be taken into consideration in order to determine whether the stabbing was merely the outcome of the grave and sudden provocation which the accused had or whether it was a premeditated act which the accused had already determined to carry out apart from any provocation to him from the deceased. Upon the facts of this case, I am of opinion that the stabbing of the deceased by the accused is directly attributable to the grave and sudden provocation which the deceased gave to the accused, and that Exception 1 to s. 300 applies to the case. I think that Exception 2 also applies to the case. It can hardly be questioned that the deceased who was evidently much enraged attacked the accused violently and in such a manner as to make him apprehend that the deceased wanted to wreck vengeance on him for his misconduct with his brother's wife which was the original cause of all this trouble between the two families. The accused had certainly the right to defend himself against such an attack. No doubt, the accused would be justified in causing death only if he could reasonably apprehend that death or grievous hurt would otherwise be the consequence of such assault. Otherwise he can only inflict so much harm as is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence. It need scarcely be observed that a man who is suddenly attacked by his enemy violently cannot be expected to judge too nicely what the consequences of the attack may be, or how much force he should use in retaliation. Considering that the deceased though the aggressor, was unarmed, it might have been unreasonable on the part of the accused to apprehend that either death or grievous hurt would result from the assault. But there was sufficient cause for him to apprehend that he would be seriously injured as the deceased held his tuft firmly and went on beating him. It is only then that he stabbed the deceased fatally in two places. I think the case is very similar to the one given in the illustration to Exception 2 in which the accused used a pistol he already had with him, but in excess of the right of private defence, and that the offence committed by the accused in this case amounts only to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. Under the circumstances the mere possession of the dagger by the accused cannot make the crime one of murder any more than the possession of the pistol by A in the illustration to Exception 2.

Lastly, I may observe that when the evidence in a case leaves room for doubt as to whether the accused has committed murder or the lesser offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, the benefit of that doubt should be given to the accused.

For the reasons stated I am of opinion that the accused should have been convicted only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder under the first part of s. 304 and I would alter the finding of the learned Sessions Judge accordingly. Taking the circumstances of the case into consideration I would reduce the sentence to one of rigorous imprisonment for a period of five years.

By the Court.—As we disagree, this case must go to a third Judge under s. 426 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

The appeal was heard in pursuance of the above said order of reference by his Lordship Wallace, J.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Wallace, J.—In my view the provocation began at an earlier stage than that noted by Mr. Justice Jackson, viz., when deceased ran out of his house calling out where is this Nagulugadu. Obviously he was then provoking a fight; if he was not he would have remained where he was in his house. This challenge accused answered verbally and then deceased started the use of violence by seizing accused by the tuft. Though the original provocation by deceased was not grave and sudden it was aggressive and the 2nd provocation, viz., seizing accused by the tuft was certainly grave and sudden.

I agree with Mr. Justice Thiruvenkatachariar that the first exception to s. 300, Indian Penal Code, is in point and that the offence is culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

I alter the conviction accordingly and reduce the sentence to rigorous imprisonment for three years.

*Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 342—
Evidence, recording of, after examination of accused —Further explanation from accused, necessity of.*

Where a Magistrate records some evidence after the examination of the accused has been concluded he should call for further explanation from the accused. [p. 348, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal from the order of the Magistrate, First Class, exercising enhanced powers under s. 30, Criminal Procedure Code, Kaithal, District Karnal, dated the 22nd June, 1927.

Mr. Ganpat Rai, for the Appellants.

Mr. R. C. Soni, for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellants Mangta and Bichha have been convicted by the learned Magistrate according to the judgment under s. 258, Criminal Procedure Code. As they were charged respectively under ss. 397 and 394, Indian Penal Code. I presume that the learned Magistrate meant to convict them under the sections under which they charged, that is, he meant to convict Mangta accused under s. 397 and Bichha accused under s. 394, Indian Penal Code. He has sentenced Mangta to seven years' rigorous imprisonment including three months' solitary confinement and Rs. 200 fine or in default to six months' further rigorous imprisonment and Bichha appellant to three years' rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 200 fine or in default to six months' further rigorous imprisonment. Rs. 200 of the fine, if realised, is to be paid to Naraina complainant and Rs. 100 to Budh Ram complainant.

The facts of the case as shown by the prosecution evidence are that Naraina's donkeys were missing for sometime. Finally he discovered that they were with Mangta appellant. He and Kalu proceeded to address Mangta on the subject and a bhunga of Rs. 50 was settled. One Budh Ram was also included in the matter to stand surety for Naraina not filing a complaint after recovery of the donkeys. The appellants accompanied Naraina and Kalu and Budh Ram along a road and the two donkeys were discovered, there and duly handed over to Naraina. Rs. 50 were also paid to the appellants and the parties separated. As they were going away Naraina, however said that he would complain to the Police about the whole subject as Rs. 50 have been extorted from him. Upon this Mangta attacked Naraina with a cutting weapon and inflicted grievous and dangerous injuries on him and Bichha appellant attacked Kalu and also inflicted hurts on him with a lathi. Budh Ram who came to the rescue of these people also had his arm severed at the wrist evidently by a blow from Mangta appellant's cutting weapon. Thereafter the appellants took away the two donkeys, which were recovered later from one Maru who said he had got them from Matu, who in his turn said that he had got them from the appellant Mangta.

These facts are established by the evidence of Naraina, Kalu and Budh Ram. There is no reason to doubt their evidence. Counsel for the appellants has argued that in any case there was no robbery as the hurt was not caused in the committing of theft or in order to commit theft. It seems to me that the appellants wished to remove the donkeys, which would be the main evidence in the case, threatened by Naraina, and they proceeded to inflict the injuries that they did inflict with this object in view. I, therefore, consider that Mangta has been rightly convicted under s. 397, Indian Penal Code, and I do not consider the sentence in any way severe. I also consider that Bichha has been rightly convicted under s. 394, Indian Penal Code, and the sentence is not severe in his case either.

Counsel from the Crown has very properly pointed out to me that the learned Magistrate recorded some evidence against the appellants after they had been examined and no further explanations were called for from the accused as regards this evidence. The evidence, however, or rather the material portion thereof consist in the recovery of a chhavi blade from Mangta. Quite apart, however, from this recovery of a chhavi blade I consider that the case is sufficiently made out against him. I have accordingly not taken into account the evidence after the accused had been examined. Counsel for the appellants did not raise this point at all.

I, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

In the case of a conviction for rape where the girl is 10 years of age no question of consent arises. [p. 348, col. 2.]

Reference made by the Sessions Judge, Cuttack, in his Letter No. 1539, Cr., dated the 16th/20th September, 1927.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

Ross, J.—This is a reference under s. 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code by the learned Sessions Judge of Cuttack. Asadali alias Tunu was charged with having on the night of the 2nd of June, 1927, committed rape on a girl Kanika aged 10 years near the compound of the Cuttack Railway Station. The trial was by Jury and the Jury by a majority 4 to 1 were in favour of giving the accused the benefit of the doubt.

The first question is whether Kanika was ravished. On that point there is her own evidence and the medical evidence as to the state of her body when she was examined and the further medical evidence that spermatozoa were found on a smear taken from the vagina. As the girl is 10 years of age no question of consent arises. The rape is proved conclusively.

The next question is as to the identity of her assailant. On this point there is the evidence of the girl herself, and she says that she had seen the accused at the Station before the occurrence also. The accused is a tout of a Motor Car Company and he frequents the Station to procure passengers for his Company's cars. The ravished girl is a beggar child who also frequents the Railway Station and there is, therefore, no improbability in her knowing the accused. She was found by the water-carrier of the Station (P. W. No. 5) about 11 o'clock the following morning lying at the Station with blood on her cloth. The water-carrier informed the Ticket Collector who with the Assistant Station Master asked the girl what had happened and questioned her as to who her assailant was. She said he was one of the Motor Car touts and she was taken to the Motor Park outside the Station to identify him and pointed out the accused. The evidence on this point is that of the Ticket Collector and the Assistant Station Master. As the latter witness was ill at the time of the trial, his statement before the Committing Magistrate on which he was not cross-examined was taken in evidence. Corroborative evidence was also given by Jalil, a bearer in the Waiting Room of the Railway Station (P. W. No. 3) and Duesan Das a Telegraph Peon of the Railway Station (P. W. No. 4) as well as by a sweetmeat seller Dwarka Nath Das (P. W. No. 9) whose shop is situated near the Station, where a crowd had gathered over this matter. Evidence was also given by two motor car touts, but the learned Assistant Government Advocate did not lay much stress on their evidence because of the defence of the accused which is that he has been charged falsely out of enmity, because there have been constant quarrels between the servants of two rival Motor Car Companies for one of which he is tout, while these two witnesses and another man called Shaikh Rakha are touts of the competing Company. There is some evidence that Shaikh Rakha was seen with the girl that morning, but there is nothing to show that he had tutored her to identify the accused and it seems to me most unlikely that a false charge of this nature would have been got up because of this rivalry. Nothing is said by the defence against the Railway Official witnesses and there is nothing in their evidence to suggest that the identification by the girl was anything but genuine.

The case, however, does not rest there. The accused was medically examined, and he was found to have two scratches on his wrist which were probably caused by a finger nail and scratches on the front of the left knee and on the front of the right knee caused by friction against a hard and rough surface. He had also an abrasion at the orifice of the urethra most probably caused by knocking at and making friction against an intact hymen and tight vaginal canal and a healing abrasion on the frenum most probably caused in the same way. Moreover, he was found to be suffering from gonorrhoea. A point was made by the defence that if he had been the assailant, then girl ought to have been infected with this disease. She was under treatment in the hospital for about a month and did not develop the disease. The Assistant Surgeon in his evidence says that as a rule gonococci would have been found in the vagina of the girl as there was sexual intercourse by the accused with the girl. But as the girl was bleeding profusely, the gonococci were probably washed out. He refers with approval to the opinion of Lyon that in the case of young children there is greater likelihood of inoculation with gonorrhoea on the freshly torn surface. But he points out that while there must be spermatozoa there only may be gonococci. The other medical witness, the Sub-Assistant Surgeon attached to the Medical College at Cuttack, says that in chronic cases of gonorrhoea (such as this) generally gonococci will not come out with the seminal fluid. The text-writers say that there is no certain test in this matter. Taylor in his Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence, 7th Edition, Vol. II, page 128, says that the probabilities of communication of a venereal disease by one person to another are certainly very high, but the facts would seem conclusively to prove that they are not 100 per cent., and if they are not 100 which is to prove that the case in dispute may not be an exception? Lyon in his Medical Jurisprudence, 6th edition, page 302, says that infected individuals do not necessarily by intercourse communicate gonorrhoea. The fact that the injured girl was not infected with the disease is, therefore by no means conclusive of the innocence of the accused. It is consistent either with his innocence or with his guilt. On the other hand, the marks found on his person clearly indicate the probability of his guilt and this combined with the direct evidence of the girl and with the evidence of identification which was promptly given leaves no room for doubt on the matter.

Evidence was gone into by the defence. Two witnesses were examined to prove that no identification took place at the Railway Station. The first of these witnesses was a Police Sub-Inspector on leave, but as he admits that he remained at the Cuttack Railway Station for 4 or 5 minutes only his evidence is of little value. The second witness was a Canal Sectional Officer who professes to have been at the Railway Station from 1-30 or 2 P. M. till 3 o'clock, that is, during the period when the identification took place. The learned Judge has discussed the evidence of this witness and, in my opinion, the witness is not telling the truth. He has not given a credible explanation of his presence at the Railway Station and his evidence cannot stand against that of the disinterested witnesses on the Railway Staff. Further evidence was given to establish an alibi by proof of a fracas having occurred between the touts of the two rival Companies that evening at which the accused was present. This occurrence seems to be admitted by the prosecution witnesses, but it does not establish any alibi because it refers to an occurrence at 6 or 7 in the evening, while the girl says that the assault upon her was made late at night. And in fact one of the defence witnesses Khairat Hussain (D. W. No. 4) admits that on the night of the 2nd June the accused was at the Station.

In consideration of all the evidence and particularly in view of the facts disclosed by the medical witnesses there can be no reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. I would, therefore, accept this reference and convict Asadali alias Tunu and sentence him to two years' rigorous imprisonment under s. 376 of the Indian Penal Code.

Criminal appeal from an order of the Sessions Judge, Attock at Campbellpur, dated the 23rd February, 1927.

Mr. Mackay, for the Government Advocate, for the Appellant.

Mr. Ali Hussain Khan, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It appears that the Police of the Attock District received information that certain dacoits were collecting to commit a dacoity at Dhok Baju Dakhli Kariman. The names of the dacoits were also known. Accordingly arrangements were made to prevent the commission of the dacoity and a Police guard was sent out to render assistance to the villagers. This was on the 23rd October, 1926. The house which was to be dacoited belonged to one Dosa, a man of doubtful character himself who was shown on register No. 10. He lived in Dhok Baju and he, together with Fakir Muhammad, was deputed by the lambardars to meet the Police guard which was coming under the command of Raja Khan Head Constable, from Campbellpur. Raja Khan was accompanied by Khan Bahadur lambardar and as they neared Dhok Baju certain men were seen at a distance. Raja Khan sent Khan Bahadur on to reconnoitre and to ascertain who those persons were. Khan Bahadur went on and found five persons seated in a depression under a shisham tree just outside Dhok Baju. He questioned them and was beaten by one of them as well as threatened by another. While he was with them Dosa and Fakir Muhammad arrived on the scene. These two, seeing the lambardar, at first did not realize that the other persons present were dacoits but as soon as they realized this fact all three of them went off and joined Raja Khan and his Policemen who were told that the men in question were dacoits. Raja Khan then moved his force nearer to these persons in order to intercept them. The dacoits fired at the Police Force but, as they were armed with revolvers only, the Police and villagers sustained no casualties. The Police returned the fire with the result that one at least of the dacoits received a bullet wound. The dacoits, however, succeeded in effecting their escape and the matter was reported to the Police Station in due course. An investigation followed, and as the names of the five persons were known steps were taken to arrest them. The persons so arrested were Wali, Ahmad, Mehmud, Bakhsha and Mirza. Ahmad and Mehmud are brothers and these two with Bakhsha were arrested together, on the 27th October, 1926, at Maira Badia. They reside in another village Chhokar in the Rawalpindi District. Their arrest was effected in the courtyard of the house of the sister of Ahmed and Mehmud. Mirza was also arrested and found to have received a bullet wound in his wrist. Wali was granted a pardon and these four persons together with three other were sent up for trial charged under ss. 399 and 402 of the Indian Penal Code.

At the completion of the trial the assessors were unanimously of opinion that the case for the prosecution was correct and that all the persons sent up for trial were guilty. They accept the statement of Wali as true. The learned Sessions Judge, however, took a different view. He came to the conclusion that the testimony of Wali was unreliable and that the witnesses, who claimed to have identified the four persons named above, were not reliable. He accordingly acquitted all the seven persons who were arraigned before him.

Against this acquittal the Local Government has preferred an appeal under s. 417, Criminal Procedure Code, in the cases of Ahmed, Mehmud, Bakhsha and Mirza, and after hearing Mr. Mackay for the Crown and Mr. Ali Hussain Khan for the respondents, in my judgment the verdict of the assessors qua these four persons was the correct one.

The learned Sessions Judge has recorded a lengthy and detailed judgment in which his reasons for disbelieving the approver are set out in detail. I do not think it necessary to discuss those reasons as, in my opinion, the weight to be attached to them is very considerably reduced by the fact that the learned Sessions Judge appears to have overlooked the fact that Mirza, who undoubtedly was injured by a gunshot wound and according to Lieutenant Colonel Corry, I. M. S., Civil Surgeon by a 303 bullet, distinctly mentions the presence of Wali on the scene. It is true that Mirza denied having been at Dhok Baju for the purpose of committing a dacoity and told a story to account for his presence there, but after a careful examination of that story it seems to me that it is one that is wholly incredible. To a large extent it is based on enmity not with the Police but with a certain lambardar. Nevertheless that enmity has not been established and, as has been held by the learned Sessions Judge, the Police cannot be said in this case to have lent themselves to any fabrication. To my mind the case rests almost entirely on the testimony of Dosa, Fakir Muhammad and Khan Bahadur. These are the three witnesses who actually saw and spoke to the dacoits on that occasion. Subsequently to the arrest of these respondents an identification parade was held under the auspices of a Magistrate of the First Class. This Magistrate has been produced as a witness and has described the steps taken by him to ensure the correctness and fairness of the identification. After consideration of his testimony I have no reason whatever to think that the witnesses had any opportunity given them to see the persons to be identified prior to the parade. Indeed none of the respondents alleged that they were shown to these persons. At this parade Dosa and Fakir Muhammad identified all four of the respondents while Khan Bahadur lambardar identified Bakhsha and Mirza alone. Now, Khan Bahadur's statement that he was sent on to reconnoitre by Raja Khan is supported by Raja Khan himself, and there is no reason to doubt the veracity of these two witnesses. Khan Bahadur says that when he arrived at the spot he found these five persons there among whom he recognised Wali as a man he already knew. None of the other four were known to him. One of the dacoits slapped him and another searched his person. He identified Bakhsha and Mirza because it was these two who slapped him and searched his person. The evidence of these witnesses, which I consider credible, leaves no room for doubt as to the presence of these four, together with Wali under the shisham tree on the night in question. They corroborate very materially the statement of Wali whose evidence as far as it refers to these men appears to be perfectly clear and above suspicion. It is true that the learned Sessions Judge refers to certain discrepancies between the statement made by Wali in Court and certain statements made by him in the course of the Police investigation. It was contended, and I think rightly contended by the learned Counsel for the Crown, that the learned Sessions Judge's action in referring to statements made before the Police with a view to contradict prosecution witnesses was entirely erroneous. The procedure is a simple one and it is clear that in this case that procedure was not carried out. Copies of the statements do not appear to have been given to the accused persons on trial and certainly no attempt has been made to prove any statement made to the Police by Wali and any of the other witnesses. It is clear, therefore, that references to those statements were irregular and ought not to have been made. Wali was seen by Khan Bahadur lambardar with the respondents on the night in question and Wali was known to that witness. Wali later on produced a revolver and it is curious feature in the case that Mirza, in setting up a story to explain his presence there, not only admits Wali's presence but definitely admits that Wali was armed with a revolver. So far as Mirza is concerned that is a very strong corroboration of his (Wali's) statement. In my judgment the statements of Dosa, Fakir Muhammad and Khan Bahadur offer sufficient corroboration of Wali's statement as against these four respondents.

There is, however, further corroboration as regards Ahmed, and Bakhsha. Ahmed was instrumental in producing a revolver in the course of the investigation. This revolver he had placed in the custody of Musammât Mukhi. Ahmed took the Police to this woman's house and had the revolver produced. According to Wali, Ahmed was on the night in question, armed with a revolver. Again Bakhsha was said by Wali to have had a spear and in the course of the investigation Bakhsha produced a spear-head. There is thus ample corroboration of the approver's story qua these two respondents and I am unable to agree with the learned Sessions Judge's comments as to the evidence relating to the recovery of these articles.

In the case of Mehmahd it appears that he was said to have received an injury on his thigh. He was examined by Lieutenant Colonel Corry and that witness found a small injury on the thigh, which, he says, could not possibly have been caused by a 303 bullet but might have been caused by such a bullet having first hit a stone and being splintered and one of the splinters entering the body of Mehmahd. He advised a Skiagram to be taken but the prosecution failed to comply with the suggestion. No steps appear to have been taken to recover the trousers that Mehmahd was wearing on the occasion which must have been pierced through to cause the injury, had that injury been due to a gunshot wound as alleged. Mehmahd himself says that he received this very slight injury some fifteen days before when he was playing kabaddi. Whether his account is correct or not I consider that the learned Sessions Judge is right in thinking that the prosecution have failed to prove that Mehmahd received any injury on the night in question. Against him, however, there is the testimony of Dosa and Fakir Muhammad already referred to, which, to my mind sufficiently corroborates the approver's story.

I would hold, therefore, that it has been proved beyond any reasonable doubt that these four persons along with Wali assembled on the night of the 23rd of October, 1926, under a shisham tree at Dhok Bajju, that two of them at any rate were armed with revolvers and one at least was armed with a spear. Ahmed, Mehmahd and Bakhsha are residents of Rawalpindi District and their presence on the occasion requires considerable explanation. The reason for their presence at that place on the night in question has been given by the approver, and his evidence, having been so materially corroborated in other particulars, I have no hesitation in accepting his statement as to the object with which he and these other persons assembled at the spot on the night in question.

In these circumstances I consider that all the four respondents committed an offence falling within the purview of s. 402 of the Indian Penal Code. In this I am supported by the decision of Mr. Justice Shadi Lal in Karmun v. Emperor (1).

I would, therefore, accept this appeal and convict Ahmed, Mehmahd, Bakhsha and Mirza under s. 402, Indian Penal Code and sentence each of them to undergo rigorous imprisonment for a period of seven years.

Income which is derived from the use of land for storing purchases of food crops, etc., and punyaha nazar paid by tenants of agricultural holdings at the beginning of the agricultural year are not 'agricultural income' as defined in s. 2 of the Income Tax Act. [p. 353, col. 2.]

Nazar paid to the zemindar for petitions presented to him for dealing with questions of succession, settlement and partition is not agricultural income although nazar paid for landlord's recognition of such transactions is such income. [p. 354, col. 1.]

Reference from the Commissioner of Income-Tax, Assam, dated the 12th of March, 1926, unders. 66 (2) of the Income Tax Act.

FACTS.—On the 12th March, 1926, the Commissioner of Income Tax, Assam, referred to the Court for decision, under s. 66 (2) of the Indian Income Tax Act of 1922, the following questions:—

I. Whether the following sources of income are agricultural and, therefore, exempted from assessment to income-tax under s. 4 (3) (viii) of the Act:—

- (i) Jalkar or rents received from fisheries.
- (ii) Ground rent from land used for potteries.
- (iii) Ground rent from land used as brick-fields.
- (iv) Fees received from the tying up of boats against the assessee's land.
- (v) Fees received from land used for storing purchase of crops (paiati).
- (vi) Fees received from cart stands.
- (vii) Punyaha nazar, or nazar paid by tenants of agricultural holdings at the beginning of the zemindari year.
- (viii) Nazar for petitions presented to the zemindar dealing with questions of succession, settlement and partition.
- (ix) Ground rent for permanent shops at hats and bazars.
- (x) Stall fees paid by temporary (daily) sellers at hats and bazars.

II. Whether income derived from such of the above sources as were not taken into consideration at the time of fixing the jama at the Permanent Settlement is assessable for income-tax purposes.

III. Whether having regard to the terms of the Permanent Settlement Regulation income derived from the above sources in permanently settled estates is liable to assessment to income-tax.

This reference came on for hearing before the late Chief Justice (Sir Lancelot Sanderson) and Mr. Justice Rankin on the 21st May, 1926. The attention of the learned Judges having been drawn to the conflict of opinion between Probhat Chandra Barua v. Emperor (1) and Emperor v. Indu Bhusan Sarkar (2), questions II and III were referred by the learned Judges to a Full Bench for decision. (Vide 102 Ind. Cas. 815)

The remaining questions came up for decision before Rankin, C. J., and Majumdar, J.

Sir B. C. Mitter and Babu Surendra Nath Guha, for the Crown.

Mr. N. Sircar and Babu Jatindra Mohan Chaudhury, for the Assessee.

JUDGMENT.

Majumdar, J.—In the present Reference, the learned Vakil who appears for the assessee confines himself to three items included in the first question, namely, item (v), item (vii) and item (viii).

With reference to item (v), namely, fees received from land used for storing purchases of crops (paiati), what is actually meant by this is given in the petition of the assessee which he presented to the Assistant Commissioner of Income Tax at Goalpara. He means the income which is derived for the use of land for storing purchases of food crops, etc., by merchants. Evidently this does not come within the definition of "agricultural income" as given in s. 2 of the Indian Income Tax Act. The income as derived is not derived from land used for agricultural purposes and, as such, such income cannot be claimed to be exempt from assessment.

With reference to item (vii), i.e., punyaha nazar or nazar paid by tenants of agricultural holdings at the beginning of the zemindari year, I am of opinion that this also does not come within the definition of "agricultural income" as given in the Act. This nazar is generally paid by tenants who are actually present on the occasion of the punyaha to the landlord. There is no uniformity in the payment of such nazar, nor is there any compulsory method for realising such nazar. The tenants, if they choose, might not pay any nazar whatsoever on that occasion and the landlord cannot under any law at present in force enforce his supposed right, nor can the landlord demand nazar at a certain uniform rate. It is purely a voluntary payment by tenants, who take part in the ceremony and who usually are present on the occasion. It is not, therefore, an income which is derived from land used for agricultural purposes.

(1) 84 Ind. Cas. 31; 51 C. 504; A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 868.

(2) 95 Ind. Cas. 539; 44 O. L. J. 427; 53 C. 524; 30 C. W. N. 524; A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 819.

The learned Vakil draws our attention to the Full Bench case of Meher Bano Khanum v. Secretary of State for India (3) and particularly to a passage in the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Greaves where the learned Judge says, referring to the salami paid to a landlord for recognition of the transfer of a non-transferable holding that "it is a money which comes to the landlord by virtue of the fact that he is the owner of the land" and that that being so it would be an agricultural income and so exempt from the operation of the income-tax.

Now, in the Full Bench case the reference was in connection with nazar paid by a tenant for recognition of transfer of a non-transferable occupancy holding. With reference to such a holding the position stands thus in law, that when such a transfer takes place the landlord is not bound to recognise such a transfer and that in case the landlord does not recognise such a transfer the landlord is free to take khas possession of the holding. When he does recognise such a transfer, that practically amounts to a sort of new settlement with the transferee and the nazar which is actually paid on the transfer by the transferee really amounts to the capitalized value of a part of the rent. Under such circumstances such nazar would be an income derived from land, and, as such, would come within the definition of "agricultural income." Though this fact was not referred to permanently in the judgment, still the effect of such a transfer and of such a recognition amounts in law to a sort of new settlement by the landlord with the transferee. That being so, the case covered by the Full Bench decision altogether stands on a different basis from the present case and can hardly be used in support of the argument advanced by the learned Vakil in connection with punyaha nazar.

Then with reference to item (viii), i. e., nazar paid for petitions presented to the zemindar dealing with questions of succession, settlement and partition, this stands on a worse ground. This has absolutely nothing to do whatsoever with lands used for agricultural purposes unless in a most indirect and remote way. The landlord is not entitled to exact from a tenant nazar for such petitions, nor is a tenant liable to pay it under any provision of law. When the question of succession opens up with regard to a holding no such petition is necessary under the law. If the holding be an occupancy holding the landlord is bound to recognise the succession, petition or no petition. It is only in certain cases that certain steps have got to be taken in connection with succession of tenures and those have been provided for in the Bengal Tenancy Act. But that has got nothing whatsoever to do with the nazar which is referred to in item (viii).

Then, the item (viii) refers to nazar for petitions dealing with questions of succession, settlement and partition. It is not "nazar paid for recognition of succession or partition or for settlement." Certainly the landlord may be entitled to something for recognising succession or partition or for settlement. That would be an income derived from land. In cases of partition the landlord may rightfully demand certain fees. In cases of holdings and tenures, if the tenants choose to partition the same, they can do it with the consent of the landlord, and the consent of the landlord may have to be purchased and in those cases the fee which the landlord would get may come under the definition of "agricultural income" as given in the Act. But in this Reference we are concerned with the nazar for petitions dealing with the questions of succession, etc., and not with nazar paid to the landlord referred to above, for obtaining the recognition of the landlord in matters of succession or partition or for settlement. Such being the case, such nazar for petitions would not come within the definition of "agricultural income" as given in the Act, so this item could also be assessable to income-tax and would not be exempt from the operation of the Income Tax Act.

Rankin, C. J.—I agree entirely in the judgment which has been delivered.

With reference to the first question put by the Commissioner of Income Tax the answers to all the items are in the negative. The answer is in the negative with reference to items (v), (vii) and (viii) for the reasons which have been given by my learned brother and with which I entirely agree.

First appeal from the judgment of the Original Side, in Civil Regular No. 351 of 1926.

Mr. M. M. Jawad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Young, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from the Original Side of this Court giving the respondent a decree, declaring that he has a lien on the stock-in-trade in shop No. 283, Dalhousie Street, Rangoon, for Rs. 2,200 being the balance due on a mortgage, Ex. A, dated the 22nd of March, 1926.

The sole question in the case is whether the appellant, when he purchased, on the 9th of July, 1926, the stock-in-trade of the first defendant Parekh, purchased it subject to the respondent's mortgage. It is admitted that the respondent was never in possession of the stock-in-trade and it is also admitted that the appellant was not aware of the respondent's mortgage when he purchased the stock-in-trade.

Section 108 of the Indian Contract Act states :—

"No seller can give to the buyer of goods a better title to those goods than he has himself, except in the following cases :—

Exception.—When any person is by the consent of the owner, in possession of any goods..... he may transfer the ownership of the goods of which he is so in possession..... to any other person, and give such person a good title thereto, notwithstanding any instruction of the owner to the contrary: Provided that the buyer acts in good faith, and under circumstances which are not such as to raise a reasonable presumption that the person in possession of the goods or documents has no right to sell the goods."

Admittedly, the buyer in this case acted in good faith, and, though the respondent's mortgage was registered, as mortgages of moveables are not required to be registered, there was no duty cast on the buyer to make a search in the Registration Office to see if there was any encumbrance. The respondent, however, urges that the exception only applies where a person is in possession of goods by the consent of the owner and that in this case the mortgagor was owner in his rights; and that the exception would not cover him.

On this point we are in agreement with the Madras High Court in Sreeram Narasiah v. Bommireddi Venkataramiah (1) where it was held that :—

"Under s. 108 of the Indian Contract Act a person in possession of moveables, although not the owner, can pass the property in the goods to an innocent purchaser. Much more than would it appear that the real owner could pass the property, which was only subject to an undisclosed hypothecation.....When goods are left in the possession of the mortgagor, a wide door is opened for fraud; when the equities between the innocent purchaser and the mortgagee have to be weighed, the preponderance must be given to the purchaser, for the mortgagee has by his omission to secure possession of the goods facilitated the commission of the fraud. In this view we think that a bona fide purchaser of hypothecated goods without notice of the encumbrance takes the goods free of it."

There is a decision to the same effect by the Recorder of Rangoon, Sir William Agnew, in Oo Tha Way v. Ko Aung Doon (2). In that case the learned Recorder followed the principle of the English case of Dearle v. Hall (3).

The learned trial Judge has relied upon a decision of the Lahore High Court in Orient Bank of India, Ltd., Lahore v. Ghulam Fatima (4). That case, however, is clearly distinguishable from the present case, in that the purchaser had knowledge of the prior encumbrance. With regard to two of the cases cited by the Lahore High Court, viz., in Ko Kywetnee v. Ko Koung Bane (5), the purchaser had notice of the prior lien and in the Privy Council case from Ceylon, Tatham v. Andree (6), the case was decided under Roman Dutch Law, which has no application in British India.

We may note that a Bench of the late Chief Court held in Manackjee Pallanjee v. Meyappa Chetty (7) that: "It is settled law that a bona fide incumbrancer without notice who is in possession of moveable property is to be preferred to an incumbrancer whose security is of prior date, and in this case it is not disputed that the appellant obtained possession of the launch through the Court and is now through the Court in possession of the sale proceeds. The appeal must accordingly be allowed and the plaintiff-respondent's suit dismissed with costs in both Courts.

JUDGMENT.

Ross, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit for a declaration that he was the purchaser in good faith and for consideration of 2 dams share in Mauza Ohobra Bargaon by a conveyance dated the 17th of March, 1921, and for an injunction restraining the 1st defendant from executing a decree, which he had obtained against the second defendant, by sale of that property.

The plaint alleges that on the 10th of February, 1921, the defendant No. 2 entered into an agreement for sale of this property to the plaintiff and that the conveyance was executed on the 17th of March. The property had been attached before judgment in a suit for money brought by the first defendant against the second defendant. The claim by the plaintiff had been decided against him in the Court executing that decree; and, therefore, this suit was brought. The second defendant in her written statement supported the plaint, admitting receipt of Rs. 200 at the time of the agreement for sale and of the balance at the execution of the deed. The defence of the first defendant was that the conveyance was fraudulent and collusive; that the plaintiff was the benamidar of defendant No. 2; and that no consideration passed.

Both the Courts below have dismissed the suit. The learned District Judge deals first with the passing of consideration and while he holds that out of the total sum of Rs. 1,200 Rs. 552 had been paid to one of the creditors of defendant No. 2, the evidence of the payment of the balance was only that of the Patiwari of the defendant No. 2 and, in his opinion, there was no proof of the passing of full consideration. The learned Judge then went on to deal with the question of fraud and collusion and, with reference to the relevant dates in the suit, namely, the dates of summons on defendant No. 2, of the order of attachment, of the appearance of defendant No. 2 and of the agreement for sale and of the attachment and of the conveyance, he concluded that the defendant No. 2 knew of the suit when she entered into the agreement for sale; that the plaintiff was also aware of the suit and of the attachment; and that the transaction itself was fraudulent and collusive within the meaning of s. 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, apparently on the ground that only a portion of the consideration was used for the payment of debts and the debtor received a substantial sum in cash. With regard to possession the learned District Judge agreed on the evidence with the finding of the Subordinate Judge that the plaintiff had not proved his actual possession over the property. But there seems to be no definite finding on this point by the Subordinate Judge though he apparently did not consider the evidence of possession satisfactory.

There are two separate matters: the first is the effect of the attachment before judgment; and the second is the question of fraudulent transfer. Order XXXVIII, r. 10 provides that attachment before judgment shall not affect the rights existing prior to the attachment of persons not parties to the suit. Now the agreement for sale was entered into before the attachment took place; and, consequently, that attachment could not affect the plaintiff's right to a conveyance under that agreement. The attachment before judgment was, therefore, immaterial in this case.

Nor does it seem to me that the defence of fraudulent transfer has been made out. This is not a pure question of fact. Nothing in s. 53 bars the right of any transferee in good faith and for consideration. There can be no doubt that in this case the transfer was for consideration and it was made at a time when a transfer could be made. Now its effect, no doubt, has been to delay or to defeat a creditor and, in such circumstances, the transfer may be presumed to have been made with that intent and, therefore, to be voidable at the option of the creditor, if it was made gratuitously or for a grossly inadequate consideration. This was not a voluntary transfer and it was not suggested that a consideration of Rs. 1,200 was insufficient. It is found that almost half of the sum was actually paid to one of the creditors and the vendor in her written statement admits receipt of the balance. While the learned District Judge holds that the plaintiff had failed to prove passing of full consideration, he also finds that only a portion of the consideration was used for payment of debts and the debtor received a substantial sum in cash. It does not seem that these two findings are strictly consistent with each other. It is no part of the duty of the purchaser to see what is done with the purchase money; and, even if the full consideration was not paid, this would not, in my opinion, be a ground for holding that the transaction was fraudulent. The applicability of s. 53 has not, in my opinion, been shown; and, as neither that section nor attachment before judgment was available as a defence to this suit, it seems to me that there ought to have been a decree.

I would, therefore, allow this appeal and decree the plaintiff's suit with costs throughout.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 92—Vendor and purchaser—Oral evidence to show that a sum of money in addition to sale price was agreed to be paid, admissibility of—Suit for possession by purchaser—Purchaser, whether entitled to possession without paying consideration—Property, when passes.

A purchaser sued his vendor for possession of the properties sold. The latter pleaded that the plaintiff had agreed to pay him a sum of money in addition to that fixed as the sale price as a preliminary to the execution of the conveyance, and that the amount paid by the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the deed was this additional amount and not part of the price. The plaintiff admitted non-payment of part of the consideration. There was no recital of receipt of consideration in the sale deed:

Held, (1) that it was open to the defendant to adduce oral evidence to substantiate his plea; [p. 359, col. 1.]

(2) that the plaintiff could be given a decree for possession only on condition of payment of the whole of the consideration remaining due to the defendant. [p. 359, col. 2.]

There is no invariable rule that mere registration of an instrument without reference to other circumstances operates to transfer the property; where a transfer is intended to be effected only in the event of a certain condition being fulfilled and, that condition not being fulfilled, effect is not given to the intention to transfer, no property passes. [ibid.]

Mr. Aung Thin, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. K. Banerjee, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Ma Kin O on her own behalf and as guardian ad litem of her minor son Maung Kyaw Zan sued to evict Maung Mon from a piece of paddy land purchased from him by a registered deed (Ex. A in Civil Regular Suit No. 8 of 1926 of the Township Court, Myittha) and for mesne profits.

The suit was originally instituted in the Township Court, but the Judge, after framing issues, hearing evidence in full, and the arguments of the Pleaders, decided that he had no jurisdiction and returned the plaint for presentation to the proper Court.

The plaint was accordingly presented to the District Court.

By consent the Judge of that Court, decided the case on the issues framed and evidence recorded by the Township Court, after hearing the arguments of the Advocates. The evidence was not transferred to the record of the District Court as it ought to have been.

Plaintiffs' case as disclosed in evidence was somewhat different to that set forth in the plaint. In the plaint it was stated that the land had been purchased for Rs. 480 as set out in the deed of sale.

In the written statement defendant admitted execution of the deed of sale, but alleged that he refused to register it, because the consideration was not paid.

In evidence plaintiff Ma Kin O admitted that she had only paid Rs. 300 out of the Rs. 480 specified in the deed of sale and expressed her willingness to pay the balance of Rs. 180.

She also admitted that she actually only bought from defendant two-thirds of the land as alleged by him in his written statement. The one-third was already in possession of plaintiff and is not in dispute.

The two-thirds in question had been bought by defendant at an auction for Rs. 480.

Defendant's whole case was consequently not disclosed till U Mon himself gave evidence as first witness cited by plaintiff.

His case briefly was that he agreed to sell the land to plaintiffs for Rs. 480 on condition that they paid the interest on the purchase money paid by him at the auction for 16 months at 4 per cent. per mensem, which approximately amounted to Rs. 300.

Plaintiff agreed to do so and paid Rs. 300 on account of interest on the price originally paid by defendant, and defendant gave her the conveyance for Rs. 480 the same day.

Plaintiff agreed to pay the purchase money Rs. 480 at the time of registration; but as she failed to do so, defendant refused to register the sale deed.

The document was ultimately registered by order of the Registrar under s. 75 of the Registration Act.

The District Court found that, as defend.

ant had not mentioned in the sale-deed that Rs. 300 had been paid as interest on the previous purchase money, evidence of the agreement to that effect was inadmissible under s. 92 of the Evidence Act.

It held that by virtue of the sale-deed plaintiff became legal owner of the land and was entitled to eject defendant and to a decree for mesne profits.

It is difficult to follow the reasoning of the learned Judge of the District Court.

The document was silent as to any payment of Rs. 300 as purchase money or otherwise.

There was no recital of receipt of consideration.

There was, therefore, no reason why defendant should not prove that there was an agreement that plaintiff should pay him Rs. 300, on account of interest on the money originally paid by him, as a preliminary to be given a conveyance for Rs. 480.

Defendant was also equally entitled to prove an agreement that the sale should not be completed by registration until the purchase money had been paid and that non-payment was his reason for refusal to register.

The lower Court seems to have forgotten the 2nd and 3rd provisos to s. 92. Defendant was entitled to prove failure of consideration. This point is not disputed. Plaintiff admitted failure to the extent of Rs. 180 and defendant alleged total failure. The main question for decision is, therefore, whether the Rs. 300 paid on the day the conveyance was executed was part of the Rs. 480 specified as consideration in the deed of sale or was a preliminary payment on account of interest as alleged by defendant, made as a condition of granting the conveyance for a further sum of Rs. 480.

We have no hesitation in holding on the evidence that defendant has established his allegation that Rs. 300 was a preliminary payment and that no part of the consideration specified in the sale-deed has been paid.

It is, however, argued that, even if it be conceded that the purchase money has not been paid, nevertheless the transfer has been completed by registration, the title to the property is with plaintiff and she is still entitled to a decree as prayed.

The authorities cited on behalf of plaintiff do not, however, support the contention that she is under the circumstances entitled to evict defendant unconditionally and to recover mesne profits.

In Ponnayya Goundan v. Muttu Goundan (1), it was undoubtedly held that registration constitutes a sufficient delivery to pass the interest in the land sold.

That was a case where earnest money had been paid. But the important point is that plaintiff was merely given a decree for specific performance on payment of the balance of the purchase money.

In Bajinath Singh v. Paltu (2), it was held that in a sale of immoveable property non-payment of the purchase money does not prevent the passing of the ownership of the purchased property from the vendor to the purchaser, and the purchaser can, notwithstanding such non-payment, maintain a suit for possession.

In that case similarly a decree was given for delivery of the property on payment of the purchase money.

Assuming, therefore, for the purposes of the argument that the effect of registration of the sale-deed was to pass the title in the property to plaintiff, she would only be entitled to obtain possession of the suit property on payment of the purchase money agreed upon, Rs. 480.

It should, however, be observed that there is authority for the proposition that where a transfer is intended to be effected only in the event of a certain condition being fulfilled and, that condition not being fulfilled, effect is not given to the intention to transfer, no property passes.

It cannot be laid down as an invariable rule that mere registration of an instrument without reference to other circumstances operates to transfer the property; vide the Madras case of Ramalinga Mudali v. Ayyadurai Nainar (3).

The Advocate for plaintiff expresses his willingness to pay Rs. 480, if we find against him on the facts, and the Advocate for defendant admits that plaintiff is entitled to possession on payment of Rs. 480.

The decree of the District Court will, therefore, be set aside and plaintiff will be given a decree for possession on payment of Rs. 480 within one month of the date of the decree.

Held, (1) that the plaintiff was not entitled to invoke the doctrine of part performance as he was not privy to the transaction on which the estoppel rested; [p. 361, col 2]

(2) that the transfer amounted to an abandonment on the part of the tenant, which entitled the plaintiff to enter into possession; [ibid.]

Second appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Rae Bareilly, dated the 22nd September, 1926, reversing that of the Munsif, Rae Bareilly, dated the 3rd June, 1926.

The appeal came on for hearing before Misra, J., who made the following Order of Reference to a Bench.

ORDER.—This is an appeal arising out of a suit brought by the Maharana of Dholpore for ejectment of the defendants from house No. 180 situate in village Bainti, District Rae Bareilly, of which he is the landlord. The suit was brought on the allegations that defendant No. 1 Mathura, was his riyaya (tenant) occupying house No. 180, in the abadi of the said village; that he sold the house to defendant No. 2, Parai Din, without the consent of the plaintiff; and that the sale was not good because of a custom prevalent in the village by virtue of which a tenant could not sell his house without the permission of the landlord.

Defendant No. 1 contended that he had not sold the house but had only temporarily given it to defendant No. 2 for occupation on rent.

Defendant No. 2, however, asserted that the house had actually been sold to him for Rs. 112-8, out of which he had paid Rs. 62-8 once previously and the remaining amount of Rs. 50 subsequently on the day when he had gone to occupy the house. He, however, alleged that no sale-deed had been executed. He denied the custom alleged by the plaintiff.

The three main contentions, therefore, for trial were whether the house had actually been sold by defendant No. 1 to defendant No. 2; whether the sale price, Rs. 112-8 had been paid in full; and whether the custom prohibiting tenants to sell their houses had been in existence in the village.

The learned Munsif of Rae Bareilly, who tried the suit, held that defendant No. 1's story that he had let out his house on rent to defendant No. 2 was untrue; that the house had actually been sold to defendant No. 2 for Rs. 112-8 and that the custom alleged by the plaintiff had been established. He also found that although there was a contract for sale yet because there was no sale-deed executed no title passed to defendant No. 2 and there was no completed sale, and thus no cause of action accrued to the plaintiff. On this view of the case he dismissed the plaintiff's suit. On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge of Rae Bareilly agreed with the findings of the learned Munsif on the question of custom and also on the question of the contract for sale. He, however, did not agree with the view taken by the learned Munsif with regard to the cause of action. He was of opinion that because defendant No. 2 had been put in possession by defendant No. 1 under a contract for sale and also because a portion of the price had been paid to defendant No. 1, that was enough to constitute a sale which could give the plaintiff a cause of action. Being of this opinion he allowed the appeal and decreed the plaintiff's claim.

In second appeal on behalf of the defendant No. 1 it is contended before me that the view of law taken by the learned Subordinate Judge is erroneous and that under s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act no sale could be completed without the execution of a registered deed. It was further contended that the receipt (Ex. B-1) was inadmissible in evidence to prove the contract for sale relating to the house.

The point of law involved in this appeal is an important one which is likely to affect a number of cases arising in Oudh out of similar circumstances. I am, therefore, of opinion that this is a fit case for decision by a Bench of two Judges of this Court. I, therefore, refer it to a Bench under s. 14 of Act IV of 1925.

Mr. D. K. Seth, for the Appellant.

Mr. Radha Krishna, for Mr. Bisheshar Nath, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is the appeal by Mathura, defendant No. 1, from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Rae Bareilly, dated the 22nd of September, 1926, reversing the decree of the Munsif of the same place, dated the 3rd of June, 1926.

The plaintiff is the proprietor of the village Bainti, Pargana Kumhrawan, District Rae Bareilly. He claims possession of a house together with the site thereof, which formerly belonged to Mathura, defendant No. 1. The plaintiff's case is that Mathura sold the house to Paridin, defendant No. 2; that under the village custom the sale was invalid, Mathura having no right to transfer the house and that in the right of the proprietor of the site he is entitled to the possession of the house together with the land on which it stands. Mathura's defence was that he had made no sale but that he had transferred possession of the house in question to Paridin on an agreement of rent being paid by Paridin for the occupation of the house. Paridin admitted the sale.

The consideration for the sale is found by the Court below to be the sum of Rs. 112-8 and according to the lower Appellate Court Paridin has paid only Rs. 25 as part consideration of the sale. No sale-deed was executed and on that ground the trial Court dismissed the suit. On appeal the lower Appellate Court has come to the conclusion that the sale must be held valid in spite of the absence of a registered deed for that purpose on the ground that there has been part-performance in relation to that transaction, the vendee having paid a part of the consideration and the vendor having delivered possession in pursuance thereof.

In appeal it is argued on behalf of the vendor that the view taken by the Court below as to the application of the doctrine of part-performance was erroneous. On the side of the respondent the argument in support of the decree of the Court below is that the findings of the Court below that Mathura has parted with the house altogether and that he has put Paridin in possession thereof and has received Rs. 25 towards the consideration of the transfer establish a case of abandonment by the tenant who had no other right in the house except that of occupation. This being so, it is argued that the plaintiff being the owner of the land on which the house stands is entitled to enter into possession.

We are of opinion that the appeal fails on the ground now urged on behalf of the respondent. The doctrine of part-performance is clearly one of equitable estoppel and the plaintiff-respondent not being privy to the transaction on which the estoppel rests can take no advantage of it. The sale even in the absence of a registered deed to evidence it may be an effective sale by reason of the estoppel as a transaction between the vendor and the vendee but there the estoppel ends. The argument on the side of the respondent based on abandonment, it seems to us, must be accepted. The facts found by the Court below clearly establish that Mathura has transferred the possession of the house to Paridin for consideration and has thereby relinquished all his rights in the said house. That being so, the abandonment on the part of Mathura is complete and as the transfer which he has made is invalid both for the reason of there being no registered document to prove it and also for the reason that such a transfer is forbidden by the village custom the transferee acquires no rights under that transfer. His possession, therefore, is that of a trespasser and the owner of the land is entitled to eject him. This principle was considered by one of us in the case of Azmat un-nissa v. Ganesh Parshad (1) and was followed by a Bench of two Judges in the late Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh in the case of Mahabir Parshad v. Uman Shankar (2). We think that those cases were rightly decided.

There remains one matter to be considered in this case and that is the question of consideration for the transfer. The lower Appellate Court has found that the consideration was a sum of Rs. 112-8. It has further found that only Rs. 25 have been paid by the vendee to the vendor in part-payment of that consideration. We have held that this act of transfer amounts to the abandonment and that the abandonment gives to the plaintiff the right to enter into the possession of the subject-matter of the transfer. The plaintiff obviously, therefore, must take the abandonment with all its incidents, one of the incidents being the payment of Rs. 112-8 to Mathura, the transferor. The abandonment rests on its consideration for it. Without the consideration there was no abandonment. Out of this sum of money the vendor has already received Rs. 25 from the vendee. The vendor, therefore, is still entitled to the balance of Rs. 87-8 and the vendee is entitled to the refund of the Rs. 25 on the failure of the consideration which has now happened by the effect of our decree which compells him to deliver possession to the plaintiff.

We accordingly confirm the decree of the Court below but delete from it the condition allowing the vendee Paridin to remove the materials within two months and in lieu thereof we direct that the plaintiff shall deposit in Court a sum of Rs. 112-8 before he is allowed to enter into possession of the house. In the event of such deposit Mathura, the vendor, will be entitled to Rs. 87-8 and Paridin, the vendee, to Rs. 25 out of the same. This deposit should be made within one month from to-day. In the event of default the plaintiff's suit shall stand dismissed with costs in all the three Courts. But in the event of compliance with the direction as to the deposit the plaintiff will get his costs from Mathura, defendant No. 1, to the extent of one half and from Paridin, defendant No. 2, to the extent of the other half in both the Courts below. The parties will bear their own costs in this Court.

G. H. Decree accordingly.

*Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 109, 110—
Duty of High Court to determine whether point of law is substantial.*

In dealing with an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council although it is no part of the duty of the High Court to prejudge the case on the merits, yet at the same time it is the duty of the High Court under the provisions of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code to determine where a point of law arises for discussion on appeal to His Majesty in Council whether there is any substance in that point. In order to entitle the appellant to appeal there must be not merely a question of law but a substantial question of law in the appeal which it is sought to prefer to His Majesty in Council. [p. 363, col. 1.]

Application for leave to appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Das and Mr. Justice Kulwant Sahay passed in M. A. No. 245 of 1926.

Messrs. H. Imam and A. Prasad, for the Appellant.

Messrs. S. M. Mullick and S. N. Roy, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Miller, C. J.—The question for determination in this case is whether there is any substantial question of law for decision by their Lordships of the Privy Council if this application for leave to appeal should be granted.

The facts shortly stated are these:—The respondents obtained in the High Court a mortgage decree against six defendants including Hira Bibi. Hira Bibi and the other defendants appealed from the decision of the High Court to His Majesty in Council. Pending that appeal the appellants applied for a stay of execution of the decree of the High Court and a stay was granted on certain terms. The appellants provided a security bond jointly which contained the following provision:—"We, therefore, do declare and give out in writing that if the Privy Council Appeal No. 57 of 1921 be decided against us (the executants Nos. 1 to 6) and the decree holders take out the execution of the decree and the entire decretal amount be not recovered by them from the value of the mortgaged property, in that case the decree holders shall be entitled to recover the balance of the decretal amount to the extent of Rs. 35,000 from the properties specified in this security bond." A second bond for an amount of Rs. 10,000 was subsequently executed containing similar terms.

The result of the appeal to the Privy Council was that the appeal on behalf of five out of the six executants of the bond failed but the appeal on behalf of Hira Bibi succeeded on the ground that her signature had not been properly attested. The suit was accordingly dismissed as against her but the decision was affirmed as against the other five executants. In these circumstances execution proceeded against the mortgaged property which proved insufficient. Thereupon the decree-holders sought to take out execution against the security provided by the two bonds already referred to. The defendants, the judgment-debtors, contended that as the suit had failed against one of the executants, therefore, the security bond was no longer available. Alternatively, as I understand, it was urged that at all events that proportion of the security bond which represented the proportionate interest of Hira Bibi should be freed from execution.

Both the trial Court and this Court on appeal decided against the contention of the judgment-debtors and held that the security bond was available for the unrecovered balance of the mortgage.

From that decision Hira Bibi seeks to appeal to His Majesty in Council and the only question which arises is one of the interpretation of the security bond in suit. In dealing with an application of this sort I fully appreciate that it is no part of the duty of the Court to prejudge the case on the merits but at the same time it is our duty under the provisions of s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code to determine where a point of law arises for discussion on appeal to His Majesty in Council whether there is any substance in that point. In order to entitle the appellant to appeal there must be not merely a question of law but a substantial question of law in the appeal which it is sought to prefer to His Majesty in Council. We must, therefore, make up our minds on that point. Speaking for myself I have not the slightest doubt that the decisions of the trial Court and of the High Court on appeal were right and that no other interpretation could be given to the words of this security bond. I must, therefore, hold that there is no substantial question of law for determination by His Majesty in Council and dismiss the present application.

Another matter which induces me to take this course is that if we should grant leave, although of opinion that the appeal does not really involve a substantial question of law, then all the expense of preparing the case for appeal to His Majesty in Council will be incurred and if our opinion should be well founded the expense would be entirely wasted. I think in the circumstances, taking the view which we do, that it is much more desirable that we should dismiss this application and the appellant, if she is so advised, can apply without any considerable expense to His Majesty in Council for special leave to appeal. If it should turn out that the view which I have now expressed is not the correct view she would undoubtedly obtain special leave to appeal and no great harm would be done. In these circumstances it seems to me that this application must be dismissed with costs. Hearing-fee five gold mohurs.

Adami, J.—I agree.

Oudh Civil Courts Act (XIII of 1879), s. 37—Suit for redemption—Limitation—Mortgage of 1795—Award recognising mortgage, whether gives fresh cause of action.

The plaintiff's predecessors-in-interest had executed a mortgage to the defendant's predecessors in 1795. There was nothing to show what the terms of the mortgage were. In 1858 there was some dispute between the parties, the matter was referred to arbitration and an award was made by which the defendant's predecessors were held entitled to remain in possession until the amount due to them under the mortgage-bond was paid. In a suit for redemption by the plaintiff:

Held, (1) that the claim to redeem the mortgage of 1795 was barred under s. 37 of Act XIII of 1879 as there was nothing to show that there was any term in the instrument of mortgage and that such term had not expired before the 13th February, 1856; [p. 365, col. 2].

(2) that the award did not amount to a fresh mortgage and did not give a fresh cause of action. [ibid.]

First appeal against a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Sultanpur, dated the 25th of January, 1926

Messrs. A. P. Sen and H. K. Ghosh, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava and Bishambhar Nath Srivastava, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a defendants' appeal against a decree allowing redemption of a 3 annas 6 pies share in the village of Sarmai in the Sultanpur District.

The history of the case is a long one. It appears that at some time about 1795 A. D. some person, whose name is unknown, mortgaged with possession to another person, whose name is unknown, a 3 annas 6 pies share in the village of Sarmai. There is nothing to show to whom the rights of the mortgagor and the mortgagee descended until the year 1856, when it is admitted that a certain Gajadhar Singh as representative-in-interest of the mortgagee was in possession of the 3 annas 6 pies share in question, the mortgagor's rights being then held by a certain Ajrael Singh, who was the representative-in-interest of the mortgagor. In 1856 during the period of anarchy, when there was no Government of any kind in the Sultanpur District, Ajrael Singh dispossessed Gajadhar Singh and obtained possession of the property; and we have it that in 1858 Gajadhar Singh and Ajrael Singh referred their claims to possession to the decision of certain arbitrators who made an award (Ex. 5) on the 5th of January, 1858. It was alleged by Ajrael Singh in subsequent proceedings that on the 22nd of February, 1858, Gajadhar Singh executed an acquittance under which he renounced all his rights to the mortgaged property which remained with Ajrael Singh. During the First Regular Settlement, Gajadhar Singh instituted a claim in respect of this 3 annas 6 pies share against Ajrael Singh. The claim was brought in the Settlement Courts, the plaintiff being Ex. 8. His claim was dismissed by the Assistant Settlement Officer in Ex. 10 on the 29th of June, 1865. Gajadhar Singh appealed to the Commissioner, who on the 25th of August, 1865, by Ex. 11 allowed his claim and placed him in possession of the 3 annas 6 pies share in question as mortgagee. In that Regular Settlement, however, his name was recorded not as mortgagee but as proprietor, and the name of himself and the names of his successors in interest have been recorded as proprietors ever since. The present suit has been instituted by a young man called Ganga Bakhsh Singh, who has established that he is the representative-in-interest of Ajrael Singh. He has sold 6/7ths of his claim to the second plaintiff Bhabhut Singh, who does not appear to have any connection with the family. The claim has been brought against the successors-in-interest of Gajadhar Singh and is a claim for redemption of the property. It has been decreed by the trial Court.

In order to understand the questions for decision in this appeal it is necessary to consider carefully the exact nature of some of the former proceedings. The task of the Courts has been rendered difficult in this respect owing to the fact that the evidence of these proceedings is contained almost entirely in certified copies of documents, many of which were procured a number of years ago. These certified copies, on the face of them, are inaccurate in many places, the copyist having clearly inserted wrong words to an extent which frequently turns a passage into a meaningless collection of words. But we have sufficient materials before us to arrive at a reasonable construction on every thing of importance. The first document that we shall consider is the plaint (Ex. 8) which was presented by Gajadhar Singh to the Assistant Settlement Officer. In this plaint he states distinctly that in the year 1265 Fasli (1857-58) Ajrael Singh with the assistance of a certain taluqdar had dispossessed him (Gajadhar Singh) from the possession of the 3 annas 6 pies share, which he held as mortgagee, without redeeming the mortgage; and he asks that possession should be awarded to him as it was held in times gone by. We can only construe this plaint as showing that Gajadhar Singh was suing on the basis of the mortgage which was executed about 1795 A. D. In his plaint he makes reference to the award (Ex. 5) of 8th of January, 1858, but only as evidence of the truth of his claim. He in no way bases his claim upon the award. The facts, as subsequently found were that although the deed of mortgage of 1795 was in existence on the 8th of January, 1858, and was shown to the arbitrators, the deed had afterwards passed out of the possession of Gajadhar Singh, and he, therefore, relied upon the award (Ex. 5) in order to prove that such a deed had existed. We now come to the award (Ex. 5). We have checked the translation in the paper book and have noted the criticism of the learned Counsel for the respondents. We find that the following is the correct translation of the passages of importance:—

"Ajrael Singh and Gajadhar Singh of Sarmai have both come for arbitration in respect to their dispute as to the debt and the share of the village. Having heard what the parties have to say, having read their documents and heard their witnesses it is decided that the bond in favour of Gajadhar Singh is a completely genuine deed. Ajrael Singh must pay Rs. 1,840 6 6 and give 3,146 maunds 35 seers of grain to Gajadhar Singh. So long as the money and grain are not given he is not to have possession of the share....."

We now come to the decision of Mr. Gibson, the Assistant Settlement Officer (Ex. 10). Mr. Gibson found that the award (Ex. 5) and the acquittance (which is not before us) were both genuine documents. He found that in some manner or other Ajrael Singh had recovered possession of the share in 1857 and that then the arbitrators had made the award (Ex. 5), but that after that award was made Ajrael Singh had paid up the full amount which the arbitrators had ordered him to pay, that Gajadhar Singh had then given him a full acquittance, and that thus all liability on the mortgage having been wiped off, Ajrael Singh was entitled to retain possession as full proprietor. Upon these findings he dismissed the claim. Mr. Reid, the Commissioner, accepted the facts that a mortgage of 1795 had been executed and that Gajadhar Singh was holding possession of the 3 annas 6 pies share under the terms of that mortgage in the year 1857. He found that Ajrael Singh had then dispossessed Gajadhar Singh and that Gajadhar Singh had then called in the aid of the arbitrators who framed the award (Ex. 5). Mr. Reid found, however, that Ajrael Singh had not paid anything to Gajadhar Singh; and on our construction of his judgment he did not find that the deed of acquittance was a genuine document. Holding thus that Gajadhar Singh was entitled as a mortgagee and holding that the mortgage had not been satisfied he restored Gajadhar Singh to possession.

Now it would be observed that ordinarily the claim of the present plaintiffs to redeem would have been a claim to redeem the mortgage of 1795; but such a claim was, on the face of it, a bad claim. Apart from anything else a claim to redeem that mortgage could only succeed under the provisions of s. 37, Act XIII of 1879, if it were shown that the instrument of mortgage had fixed a term within which the property comprised therein might be redeemed and such term had not expired before the 13th of February, 1856. It is impossible to say that the mortgage of 1795, which had disappeared before 1855, contained any such term, and thus the provisions of s. 37 effectively prevented a claim to redeem the mortgage of 1795. The plaintiffs-respondents clearly foresaw this difficulty for they have based their claim upon the award (Ex. 5), asserting that that award was in effect a novation which created a new mortgage. The learned Counsel for the respondents in support of this view has suggested to us that the arbitrators, who made that award, were not concerned only with a single transaction of mortgage, but that they were concerned with a variety of disputes between Gajadhar Singh and Ajrael Singh, only one of which was in respect of the mortgage of 1795, and that they arrived at an arrangement by which the 3 annas 6 pies share was to be placed in possession of Gajadhar Singh in satisfaction of the total amount due to him under these several heads with a fixed amount to be paid by Ajrael Singh for redemption of the property. Even if this were a correct construction of Ex. 5, it would be difficult, in our opinion, to consider that such a transaction created a mortgage, but it is unnecessary to discuss that question as, on our construction of Ex. 5, we do not consider that there was any general dispute before the arbitrators. As we read Ex. 5 we find that all that it says is that Gajadhar Singh, who had been in possession under the mortgage of 1795 had been put out of possession by Ajrael Singh, that Ajrael Singh had justified his action by denying the validity of the deed of 1795, and that the arbitrators, finding the deed of 1795 to be a genuine deed, had ordered Ajrael Singh to restore possession to Gajadhar Singh and had laid down that the amount due under the terms of the deed of 1795 for redemption of the property was Rs. 1,840 6-6 in cash and 3,146 maunds 35 seers of grain. We read the award as creating nothing new. It was no more than a decision that Gajadhar Singh was entitled to hold possession of the property and that the amount due under the deed for its redemption by Ajrael Singh was the amount which we have already stated. In these circumstances the plaintiffs-respondents have no right to redeem.

The defendants hold the property as the successors in-interest of the original mortgagee under the deed of 1795, and as under the provisions of s. 37, Act XIII of 1879, no suit can be brought for the redemption of that mortgage, the plaintiffs' suit should have been dismissed. We accordingly allow this appeal and direct that the plaintiffs' suit shall stand dismissed. The plaintiffs will pay their own costs and those of the contesting defendants in both Courts.

Messrs. V. Bose and P. N. Rudra, for the Applicant.

Messrs. M. V. Abhyankar and G. R. Bapat, for the Non-Applicant.

ORDER.—The defendant-applicant Ramlal, has applied for leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council against the judgment and decree of this Court, dated 1st April, 1927, in First Appeal No. 71 of 1925.*

The only question involved in the said judgment was as to whether the gift of Mouza Ekodi granted to Harpriabai was one for maintenance only, or was an absolute one. The judgment of this Court affirmed the judgment of the Court below and held that the said grant was merely a maintenance one to Harpriabai and her children. She admittedly had no heirs and, therefore, the village was held to have rightly reverted to the plaintiff-non-applicant. It is not disputed that the value of the subject-matter in dispute, both in the Court of first instance and of appeal to His Majesty in Council, is above Rs. 10,000. What the defendant-applicant, therefore, has to establish, before leave to appeal can be granted, is that a substantial question of law is involved in the case. There has been considerable difference of judicial opinion as to the meaning of the term "substantial question of law" in s. 110 of the Civil Procedure Code. One school of opinion has been to the effect that the said phrase implies a substantial question of law of general importance and not merely one of substantial importance as between the parties to the suit: cf. Bishambhar Nath v. Muhammad Abaidullah (1). This matter has now been set at rest by the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Raghunath Prasad Singh v. Deputy Commissioner of Partabgarh (2). Their Lordships have therein definitely laid down that the term "substantial question of law" merely means such a question as between the parties in the case involved.

It remains, therefore, to decide whether, in the circumstances of the present case, such a substantial question of law can be said to be outstanding. The learned Counsel for the defendant-applicant has pointed out that the evidence, on which the Bench of this Court came to the conclusion it did, fell into five sections: (1) certain oral evidence; (2) a Will (Ex. D-9); (3) certain evidence of a practice in this zemindari of making provision for unmarried daughters and female relatives by giving them a grant of the profits of a village for maintenance; (4) a statement made by Harpriabai herself; and (5) certain settlement entries referred to in para. 10 of the judgment of this Court.

(1) 79 Ind. Cas. 213; 46 A. 227; A. I. R. 1924 All. 559; L. R. 5 A. 158 Oiv.

(2) 102 Ind. Cas. 889; 2 Luck. 93; 31 O. W. N. 495; A. I. R. 1927 P. C. 110; 4 O. W. N. 515; (1927) M. W. N. 519; 26 L. W. 70 (P. C.).

*See 102 Ind. Cas. 785 [Ed.]

The oral evidence produced by the defendant and by the plaintiff alike was held by the Bench to be unconvincing. Mr. Bose has urged that the remaining evidence is almost wholly documentary, so that our decision depended upon the right construction of documents. He cites a remark of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Fateh Chand v. Kishan Kunwar (3):

"The right construction of documents is a question of law which Judges in second appeals are not, by ss. 584 and 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure, precluded from considering by any finding of a lower Appellate Court, based upon such documents."

But the construction of the passage relied on in the Will is of a very minor importance in the present case and forms only one of the number of bases on which our findings stand; and it cannot, in our opinion, be maintained that there is any valid doubt regarding the meaning of Musammât Harpriabai's statements or of the correct interpretation of the settlement entries. We do not consider, then, that there is any question regarding the right construction of a document which is of substantial importance as between the parties to the suit.

It is next urged that as we have arrived at a decision on a question of fact—namely, whether the grant was one for Musammât Harpriabai's life only or in perpetuity—by drawing inferences from certain facts which we held to be proved, our findings involve a question of law. In support of this contention, the learned Counsel refers us to a number of rulings. In Nafar Chandra Pal v. Shukur Sheikh (4), where their Lordships of the Privy Council stated:—

"Questions of law and of fact are sometimes difficult to disentangle. The proper legal effect of a proved fact is essentially a question of law, so also is the question of admissibility of evidence and the question of whether any evidence has been offered on one side or the other; but the question whether the fact has been proved, when evidence for and against has been properly admitted, is necessarily a pure question of fact."

In Surendra Nath Roy v. Dwarka Nath Chakrabutty (5), Sanderson, C. J., remarked as follows:—

".....when one remembers that the question which it is desired to argue is this, whether upon certain given facts or data the tenancy is to be regarded as one at will or one of a permanent nature, it seems to me that this is a matter in which a substantial question of law is involved."

And in the same case, Mookerjee, J. made the following observations at page 129*—

"The only other question is, whether the decree appealed against, which is in affirmance of the decree of the Court immediately below, involves a substantial question of law. As already explained by the Chief Justice, the question in controversy relates to the nature of the tenancy held by the defendants under the plaintiffs; was that a permanent tenancy or a tenancy terminable by notice to quit? The District Judge has in effect accepted the findings of the Court of first instance, but he has drawn from those findings a conclusion precisely contrary to that drawn by the trial Court. The question thus is, what inference may legitimately be drawn from the facts found, and this clearly is a mixed question of fact and law, as appears from a long line of case reviewed in Mahoram Sheikh Chaprasi v. Telamuddin Khan (6) and Rajah Makund Deb v. Gopi Nath Sahu (7)."

In another case, the facts of which are somewhat apposite to those of the present case, viz., Satgur Prasad v. Raj Kishore Lal (8), the point involved was the nature and effect of the possession of property by a Hindu widow. There were two alternatives, viz., that her possession was only in lieu of maintenance, and the other that it was adverse possession. Such a question had to be decided by legal inferences drawn from documents. The opinions of the Courts, although concurrent, were held not to be findings of fact; and where wrong conclusions had been drawn from such inferences, their Lordships held it was their duty to interfere.

We are, however, unable to agree that whenever the decision of a certain fact is based to some extent on inferences from other facts it can be said that a substantial question of law is involved. The present defendant-applicant attempted to support the theory of absolute gift by oral evidence and his witnesses have been disbelieved. It was the applicant who urged that it could be inferred from the terms of a Will (Ex. D-9) that the grant was in perpetuity, and the conclusion to which we came was that no such inference could be drawn. We held that the admissions of Musammāt Harpriabai could not be reconciled with the position which the defendant is now taking up. We laid some stress on the entries made at the settlement and relied on evidence that there was a practice in this zemindari of giving to daughters and other female relatives grants of villages for maintenance: the existence of this practice, although it did not amount to anything like a custom within the technical meaning of the term, was a fact which supported the position of the plaintiff. Our finding is based, to a very large extent, on the clear admissions of Musammāt Harpriabai, applicant's predecessor in title. We do not consider that the correctness of our decision depends on the answer given to any substantial question of law.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the present appeal cannot be said to involve a substantial question of law as between the parties and we are unable, therefore, to certify the present case as one in which leave to appeal should be granted. The application is accordingly dismissed; the applicant must bear the non-applicant's costs. We fix Rs. 50 as Counsel's fees.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 63, O. XLVII, r. 1—Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 42—Suit for mere declaration by person who has not preferred claim or objection, whether maintainable—Review—Omission to argue point of law fully—No ground for review.

A person who has failed to make a claim or objection under O. XXI, r. 58 of the Civil Procedure Code is not entitled to sue for a mere declaration under O. XXI, r. 63 of the Code, where he is able to seek further relief. [p. 370, col. 1.]

An application for review on a point of law cannot be maintained on the ground that that point of law was not fully argued. [p. 370, col. 2.]

Mr. U. Pu, for the Applicants.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are set out in my judgment in Civil Second Appeal No. 495 of 1926 of this Court. In that judgment I said in effect that because the present applicants had not applied for removal of the attachment, when the property which they claimed was attached, they were not entitled to institute a suit under the provisions of O. XXI, r. 63 in respect of that property and that because they were not in possession of the property and would be entitled to possession of it or of part of it in case they established the claim which they desired to make, they were barred by the proviso to s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act from suing for a bare declaration of their title or interest in the property.

Applicants ask me to review my finding on that point. Their learned Advocate contends now, as he contended at the hearing of the appeal, that a suit lies under O. XXI, r. 63, even if there is no application for removal of the attachment and that the applicants' suit was brought under the provisions of that rule.

In support of his contentions he has now cited a number of cases, some of which were not cited at the hearing of the appeal.

The earliest of the cases cited is that of Wamanrao Damodar v. Rustomji Edalji (1). In that case the mortgagee of certain properties obtained a decree for the sale of the properties. After the decree was made, but before the sale or proclamation of sale, the mortgagor's brothers claimed that the mortgaged properties were owned by them and the mortgagor jointly. The Court ordered that their claim should be notified in the proclamation for sale. The mortgagee then filed a suit against them for a declaration that his mortgagor was sole owner of the properties. The question arose whether such a suit lay under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act and the Court held that it did lie. That case is clearly no authority for the contention that a suit such as the present lies either under O. XXI, r. 63 or under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act, since there was in it no question of the application of O. XXI, r. 63, or the corresponding provisions of the earlier Code of Civil Procedure and it does not appear that the mortgagee was able to seek further relief than a mere declaration of title against the defendants, so that the proviso to s. 42 would be no bar to his suit under the Specific Relief Act.

In the case of Raghunath Mukund v. Sarosh K. R. Kama (2) a number of creditors obtained decrees against different persons, each of whom was alleged to be owner of a certain mill, and in execution of their decrees each of them attached the mill as belonging to his judgment-debtor. Raghunath applied for removal of one of the attachments but his application was dismissed. He then filed a suit under s. 283 (now O. XXI, r. 63) of the Code, not merely against the creditor whose attachment he had opposed, but against all the creditors who had attached the property. It was contended that under s. 283 he could sue only the creditor whose attachment he had opposed but it was held that the summary remedy given by s. 278 (now O. XXI, r. 58) of the Civil Procedure Code to a person whose property has been wrongfully attached is alternative with the more elaborate one by way of suit, which he if so minded may adopt, and that the object of the section is not to deprive a claimant of his remedy by suit but to give him, if he is diligent, a more speedy and summary remedy. This may be true, but if the claimant prefers the remedy by suit his suit will be subject to the limitations imposed by law on such suits, and if it is a suit for a bare declaration it may be barred by the proviso to s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act.

The next case is that of Kristnam Sooraya v. Pathma Bee (3) where it was held that the proviso to s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act does not operate so as to take away from a party against whom an order has been made under ss. 280, 281 or 282 (now O. XXI, rr. 60, 61, 62) of the Code the special right conferred by s. 283 (now O. XXI, r. 63) to sue for a declaration of his title so far as it is affected by the order which he seeks to impeach. It is clear that that case cannot be regarded as an authority on the questions which arise in the present case since in this case it is admitted that there was no order made under O. XXI, r. 60.

Applicants' learned Advocate has mentioned also the case of Societa Coloniale Italiana v. Shwe Le (4). In that case the decree-holders attached certain property and the defendants in the suit applied for removal of the attachment. While that application was pending, the decree-holders filed a suit for a declaration that the property belonged to their judgment-debtor.

The decision was in these words "It is admitted now that Chap. VI of the Specific Relief Act does not apply to the case . . . but I think there is no doubt that plaintiffs have a right of suit quite independent of s. 283, Civil Procedure Code. That a person who claims to be the owner of attached property has such a right was laid down in Raghunath Mukund v. Sarosh K. R. Kama (2) and there is no reason why the decree-holder should not have a like right of suit provided he has attached the property and his right to attach it has been disputed." The facts of that case differ from those of the present case in that in the present case there has been no application for removal of the attachment, and it may be mentioned that a Bench of this Court has already expressed dissent from the view taken in that case that independently of s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act and of the provisions of O. XXI, r. 63, a decree-holder who has attached property and whose right to attach has been disputed has a right to sue for a bare declaration of his judgment-debtor's title.

(1) 21 B. 701; 11 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 471.

(2) 23 B. 266; 12 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 176.

(3) 29 M. 151.

(4) 4 L. B. R. 252; 14 Bur. L. T. 135.

The decision in the case cited above was mentioned by a Single Judge of the Chief Court in the case of Chan Tat Thai v. Ma Lat (5) which was not officially reported but to which the applicants' learned Advocate has referred. In that case a decree-holder had attached certain property in execution of his decree but had subsequently withdrawn the attachment, and the learned Judge said that although he was not entitled to sue under O. XXI, r. 63, for a declaration of his judgment-debtor's title to the property, he was nevertheless entitled to sue for such a declaration under the Specific Relief Act. This may or may not be correct, but even if it is correct it is clear that if the plaintiff sues under the Specific Relief Act his suit will be subject to the limitations imposed by that Act and one of those limitations is contained in the proviso to s. 42.

The last case to which the learned Advocate has referred is the case of Meyappa Chettiar v. Maung Po Thein (6). In that case there was no attachment but the decree-holders sued for a declaration of their right to attach certain properties in execution of their decree and was held that such a suit did not come within the purview of s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act. It may be noted that that is the case referred to above, in which doubts were cast on the correctness of the decisions in the cases of Societa Coloniale Italiana v. Shwe Le (4) and of Chan Tat Thai v. Ma Lat (5). It is clearly no authority for the proposition that such a suit as the present falls within the provisions of O. XXI, r. 63, or that if it is a suit under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act it would not be barred by the proviso to that section.

I am still of opinion that applicants were bound to make a claim or objection under O. XXI, r. 58 if they desired to sue for a bare declaration under O. XXI, r. 63, and that although the provisions of O. XXI, r. 63, would not debar them, in case they failed to make a claim or objection under O. XXI, r. 58, from suing for any relief to which they might be entitled, their suit, if it was a suit for a bare declaration, would be barred by the proviso to s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act if they were able to seek further relief than a mere declaration and omitted to do so. In the judgment which is under review I held that they were entitled to claim further relief and as they omitted to do so, their suit was, in my opinion, rightly dismissed as being barred by that proviso.

The present application is in effect an application for the re-hearing of the appeal on a point of law on the ground that that point was not fully argued. I do not think that that is a good ground for review and as I am not satisfied that there was any ground for review within the meaning of O. XLVII, r. 1, I reject the application.

Hindu Law—Alienation—Suit to set aside alienation by guardian—Consideration binding to extent of half—Decree, form of.

In a suit by a minor to set aside an alienation made by his guardian where the amount of consideration which is found not binding upon the plaintiff is large, Courts will not be justified in allowing the vendees to retain a portion of the property purchased by them. In such cases the proper decree would be to give a decree to the plaintiff for possession of the property sold, and give a charge to the defendants for the amount found binding on the plaintiff.

Where out of the consideration of Rs. 1,500 and Rs. 800 for two sales, the binding portions were Rs. 912 and Rs. 407 respectively:

Held, that the sales should be set aside on payment by the plaintiff of the binding amounts.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Trichinopoly, in A. S. No. 36 of 1924 (A. S. No. 7 of 1923, District Court, Trichinopoly), preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Turiayur, at Trichinopoly, in O. S. No. 768 of 1920 (O. S. No. 241 of 1918, District Munsif's Court, Srirangam).

FACTS.—The plaintiffs sued to set aside two alienations by their mother as their guardian executed the same day, by two documents, Exhibit I for Rs. 800 in favour of the 2nd defendant in the case, and Ex. II for Rs. 1,500 in favour of the 1st defendant.

(5) 33 Ind. Cas. 124; 9 Bur. L. T. 89.

(6) 95 Ind. Cas. 98; 4 Rang. 22; A. I. R. 1926 Rang. 124.

The learned District Munsif held that out of the consideration only Rs. 397 and Rs. 745 respectively were for discharge of binding debts and, therefore, for necessary purposes and accordingly set aside the sales and gave the plaintiffs a decree for possession on payment of the said amounts.

On appeal, however, the learned Subordinate Judge held that having regard to the circumstance that both the sales were on the same date and there were necessary debts of the family to the extent of Rs. 1,319 made up of Rs. 407 partly utilised in respect of the alienations in favour of the 1st defendant, but with the consent of the defendants held that the sale Ex. II was entirely binding on the plaintiffs with a direction to defendants to pay Rs. 181, the balance, and also held that the sale in favour of the 1st defendant was not binding to any extent.

Accordingly in modification of the decree of the 1st defendant, plaintiffs were held entitled to the property dealt with by Ex. I and also to Rs. 181 from the alienee under Ex. II.

The plaintiffs preferred a second appeal.

Mr. T. V. Muthukrishna Iyer, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. Srirangachariar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The only point in this second appeal is whether the 1st and 2nd defendants should be allowed to retain a portion of the property purchased by them or whether they should be allowed to have only a charge for the amounts found binding upon the plaintiffs. The District Munsif decreed possession of the plaintiff property and gave a charge to the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 for the amounts binding on the plaintiffs. The Subordinate Judge has modified the decree by allowing defendants Nos. 1 and 2 to retain a portion of the property purchased by them. It is found by the Subordinate Judge that out of the consideration of Rs. 1,500 for Ex. II only Rs. 912 was binding upon the plaintiffs, and out of the consideration of Rs. 800 for Ex. I only Rs. 407 was found binding upon the plaintiffs. In these circumstances, the question is whether the Court would be justified in giving defendants Nos. 1 and 2 any portion of the property purchased by them. When the consideration which is found binding upon the plaintiffs, is a little more than half, it would not be right to allow the transaction to stand to any extent. We cannot lay down any hard and fast rule as to the form of the decree in cases of this kind. But where the amount of consideration which is found not binding upon the plaintiff is large, the Courts will not be justified in allowing the vendees to retain a portion of the property purchased by them. In such cases the proper decree would be to give a decree to the plaintiffs for possession of the property sold and give a charge to the defendants for the amount found binding on the plaintiffs. We, therefore, set aside the decree of the Subordinate Judge and restore that of the District Munsif with costs here (one set) and the lower Appellate Court. The amounts found due by the Subordinate Judge will stand. The memorandum of objection is dismissed with costs.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 11-A—Execution of decree—Resistance to delivery of possession—Suit to recover possession—Limitation.

A obtained a decree against B for possession and obtained symbolical possession against B in execution of his decree. When A wanted to take khas possession by removing certain huts he was resisted by C who claimed to be a tenant in his own right. The Executing Court rejected A's application for possession on the 28th February, 1918. A sued C for possession on the 10th December, 1919:

Held, that the suit was barred under Art. 11-A of Sch. I of the Limitation Act as it was not instituted within one year from the date of the order rejecting A's application for possession. [p. 372, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Third Court of 24-Parganas, dated the 8th August, 1923, reversing that of the Munsif, Second Court, Baruipore, dated the 20th June, 1921.

Babu Ramgati Sarkar, for the Appellants.

Babus Biraj Mohan Mojumdar and Jotindra Nath Sanyal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

B. B. Ghose, J.—The only point involved in this appeal is whether the suit is barred by limitation. The trial Court made a decree in favour of the plaintiffs. On appeal by the defendants that decree was reversed by the Subordinate Judge who held that the suit was barred by one year's rule of limitation under Art. 11-A of the Indian Limitation Act. What happened was this—the plaintiffs obtained a decree against third persons in a previous suit. In execution of that decree they obtained symbolical possession against the judgment debtors. They, however, wanted to remove certain huts which were on the land and to take khas possession. These huts were claimed by the defendants who resisted the plaintiffs in taking possession on the ground that they were on the land as tenants in their own right. The Executing Court rejected the plaintiffs' application for khas possession on the finding that the defendants were on the land in their own right. That order is dated the 28th of February, 1918. The present suit was brought on the 10th December, 1919, that is, more than one year after the order was passed. The suit is evidently barred by Art. 11-A of the Limitation Act.

The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

Sulaiman, J.—This is a defendant's appeal arising out of a suit for pre-emption. A number of grounds are taken in appeal which I proceed to consider seriatim. The first point is that the Court below has erred in applying the provisions of the Agra Pre-emption Act. This contention is well-founded. The sale-deed was executed on the 23rd June, 1922, long before the new Act came into force. As held in the case of Sarju Prasad v. Bhagwati Prasad (1) the Agra Pre-emption Act came into force on the 17th February, 1923. Section 12, cls. (1), (2) and (3), relied upon by the Court below in its finding on issue No. 1, have, therefore, no application. The second ground of appeal challenges the finding as to the existence of custom and is intended to deny the preferential right of the present plaintiff, Musammam Mohan Kunwar. The third ground asserts that the entry in the wajib-ul-arz of 1872 was a record of contract which has ceased to have any binding effect after the expiry of that settlement.

(1) 88 Ind. Cas. 297; A. I. R. 1925 All. 542; 23 A. L. J. 373; L. R. 6 A. 337 Civ.

The evidence in support of the custom of pre-emption consists of entries in the wajib-ul-araiz of 1269 and 1281 Faslis. Under para. 22 of the first wajib-ul-arz an offer has first to be made to a near brother, and if he refuses to take it then to the lambardar of the other thok, and, if he refuses to take it, to anyone else. Under para. 18 of the second wajib-ul-arz the first offer has to be made to jaddi co-sharers, and if they refuse to take the property then to the proprietors of the village and if they also refuse to take it then to anyone else. Though there are slight differences in the two categories I do not think that these two records are contradictory. Under the first wajib-ul-arz it might not have been intended that a near brother would have the first right even though he was not a co-sharer. In any case there was nothing strange if subsequently the right of relations was limited and made conditional on their being co-sharers. I, therefore, think that the presumption of custom raised by the entry in the wajib-ul-arz of 1281 Fasli has not been rebutted by anything in the earlier wajib-ul-arz, and that a custom exists.

In this connexion I should like to dispose of the contention raised on behalf of the respondents, that even if the record were not one of custom it would, under the Full Bench case of Aulad Ali v. Ali Athar (2), bind the present parties. Even if we assume that the original parties to the contract of 1281 Fasli were dead, and their representatives were Sheobaran Singh the original plaintiff, and Bhup Singh, the vendor, the contract would not be subsisting after the expiry of the settlement. No doubt in the Full Bench case the agreement had provided that the executants can transfer the properties among themselves, that is, one executant can transfer it to the other and that in case of transfer to another person the other executant will acquire it by pre-emption, and yet the Full Bench held that the offer had to be made, not only to the executant, but to their representatives also. Even though Shah Nasiruddin, the vendor in that case, was himself a party to the contract, and the pre-emptor was a representative of the other party, the Bench have not laid any stress on this fact but have laid down that such a contract of pre-emption binds the parties and their representatives.

(2) 100 Ind. Cas. 683; A. I. R. 1927 All. 170; 25 A. L. J. 289; 49 A. 527 (F. B.).

No contention appears to have been at all advanced that on a true interpretation of the document in dispute in that case it was the intention to confine the right to the parties only. It was assumed that it did not. In cases where the contract is for a fixed period of settlement the ordinary intention is that the agreement would last during that period only, and I am unable to hold that the Full Bench case is any authority for the proposition that even when on a true interpretation of an agreement, the contract is limited to a fixed period of time it will bind the representatives of the parties for all time to come. The point considered by the Full Bench was the question of law whether the agreement bound the representatives, and not the interpretation of the deed of agreement. In the case of Mohammad Jan v. Fazal-ud-din (3) I had expressed the dissenting view that a contract of pre-emption was a contract in personam which would bind the parties thereto, and though in case of a breach by either of them it could be enforced against his representatives, neither party had any power to contract on behalf of his descendants that they should make an offer to the descendants of the other party before transferring the property to a stranger. In my opinion there was a difference between a contract entered into by the parties for themselves and one entered into on behalf of their descendants, as the breach in the latter case would be a breach committed not by any party himself but by his descendants. I had thought that such a contract could not bind an indefinite class of descendants, generation after generation, and to bind them for an indefinite length of time. It is that view which has been overruled by the Full Bench. Where, however, the intention of the parties that the contract should remain in force between themselves only, or only for a fixed period of time, is quite clear from the language of the document itself and the attending circumstances, it cannot be held that the contract nevertheless remains in force for all time to come and for all generations.

According to the admitted pedigree the original plaintiff Sheobaran Singh and the vendor Bhup Singh were the grandsons of Bhim Singh, whereas the vendee is descended not from Bhup Singh but from Bhim Singh's great-grandfather • Nazib

(3) 85 Ind. Cas. 482; 46 A. 514; 22 A. L. J. 400; A. I. R. 1924 All. 657; L. R. 5 A. 761 Civ.

Singh. It is, therefore, obvious that the plaintiff Sheobaran Singh could claim to be the jaddi (descended from a common ancestor) co-sharer with the vendor Bhup Singh within the meaning of para. 18 of the wajib-ul-arz of 1281 Fasli. It could never have been the intention that persons descended from a much remoter common ancestor are to be placed on the same footing as those from a nearer common ancestor. If such a view were accepted then in many cases persons of the same caste living in a village would all become of the same status if they could trace descent from some common ancestor however remote. I am, therefore, of opinion that Sheobaran Singh should be treated as a jaddi co-sharer with Bhup Singh as against the vendee who is descended from a much remoter ancestor.

The learned Vakil for the appellant contends that even if Sheobaran Singh had a preferential right against the vendee his widow Musammat Mohan Kunwar has not, because she is not a jaddi co-sharer with the vendor and that inasmuch as a successful plaintiff must have a subsisting right of preference till the time of the passing of the first Court's decree that suit cannot succeed. If the effect of the Full Bench ruling in the case of Wajid Ali v. Saban (4) is that the right to sue survives it would mean that the heir of a deceased plaintiff can continue the suit and obtain a decree on the strength of the right of his deceased predecessor and not necessarily on the strength of his or her own right. In this view it would be immaterial whether Musammat Mohan Kunwar has herself a preferential right as against the vendee. But the learned Vakil has invited our attention to the case of Partap Singh v. Daulat (5) where it was remarked that if the heir himself has no preferential right as against the vendee the suit could not succeed. The Judges who decided this last-mentioned case constituted the majority in the Full Bench. One is, therefore, constrained to hold that the two cases were distinguishable. The result would then be that the present case would be governed by the principle underlying the subsequent Division Bench case and not by that underlying the Full Bench case.

I am, however, relieved from expressing

(4) 3 Ind. Cas. 820; 31 A. 623; 6 A. L. J. 887; 6 M. L. T. 352.

(5) 22 Ind. Cas. 678; 36 A. 63; 12 A. L. J. 18.

any final opinion on this question because I think that even Musammat Mohan Kunwar comes in the second category of pre-emptors and the vendee does not.

The wajib-ul-arz of 1281 Fasli gives the second right to the proprietors of the village. When this wajib-ul-arz was prepared the village was a single mahal. It has subsequently been partitioned and co-sharers in one mahal have ceased to have any interest in the other mahal. No new wajib-ul-arz has been prepared, nor is there anything to show that at the time of the partition it was agreed that co-sharers in different mahals would, in spite of the partition, have a right of pre-emption in respect of the other mahal. The custom of pre-emption, no doubt, continues. But in the absence of any evidence to the contrary it must now be confined to each of the new mahals which have been formed, with the result that proprietors in one mahal cannot have any right of pre-emption as regards shares in the other mahals. The vendee, therefore, cannot claim to be on the same footing as Musammat Mohan Kunwar, who is a co-sharer in the very mahal in which the property sold is situate.

Sheobaran Singh died after the institution of the suit and before the first Court's decree. His widow, Musammat Mohan Kunwar, was brought on the record as the legal representative of the deceased. She became a co-sharer by succession to her deceased husband. Even though she was not a co-sharer at the time when the sale-deed was executed or when the suit was filed, she was entitled to continue the suit inasmuch as a right to sue survived. This point is settled by the view of the majority of the Full Bench case referred to above. The defendant-vendee is not a co-sharer in the mahal in which the property sold is situated. Musammat Mohan Kunwar is a co-sharer. She has thus even in her own right, preference over the vendee. The case of Partap Singh v. Daulat (5), even if it be assumed not to be in conflict with the Full Bench case, is, therefore, distinguishable.

The last two grounds deal with the question of consideration. The sale consideration was Rs. 6,690 out of which Rs. 450 and Rs. 1,047 were left in deposit with the vendee for payment to Sheobaran Singh, plaintiff. The vendee made payments after considerable delay, viz., of five months and two years, but he paid Rs. 38-11-11 more. It is obvious that the vendee cannot claim credit for the excess sum paid. It was his duty to make the payments at once and, if he withheld payments he benefited by the use of the money in his hands and was himself liable for any extra interest that might accrue in the intervening period. The plaintiff is not bound to pay more than the true sale consideration mentioned in the sale-deed.

I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

Banerji, J.—I agree in dismissing the appeal. It is clear that the Agra Pre-emption Act has no application as the sale-deed was executed on the 23rd June, 1922. The real question in the case is whether there is a custom of pre-emption and whether Musammāt Mohan Kunwar had a preferential right. I am of opinion that prima facie the wajib ul arz filed in the suit as evidence proves that there was a custom of pre-emption and nothing has been shown by the defendant to rebut the presumption raised by the wajib-ul-arz. It is unnecessary, in my opinion, to discuss the effect of the Full Bench case of Aulad Ali v. Ali Athar (2), as upon the finding of my learned brother with which I agree Musammāt Mohan Kunwar comes in the second category of the pre-emptors and the vendee does not. The result of that would be that Musammāt Mohan Kunwar would have a preferential right.

The last ground urged as to the claim put forward that the vendee had to pay Rs. 300 more which should be paid by the pre-emptor, has no force, as the pre-emptor cannot be asked to recoup the vendee because he had to pay interest on account of his own laches.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals arise out of two suits filed by two worshippers for a scheme for two temples.... An application was made to the Collector for sanction to file the suits but sanction to file the suit was refused by the Collector and the present plaintiffs without bringing this fact to the notice of the Advocate-General got ex parte sanction. As the sanction stands unrecorded (?) this would not affect the right of the plaintiffs to sue though it may be taken into consideration in considering the bona fides of the petitioners. The plaints were filed on the 19th July, 1921, in both the suits. They were adjourned from time to time for various reasons and finally on the 24th August, 1922, i. e., more than a year after the suits were filed they came on for hearing. On that date it was adjourned to the next and on the 25th August, 1922, Exhibits were filed and the witnesses were examined. Then a compromise petition was filed and as the 2nd plaintiff on the one side and some of the defendants on the other side were absent, the case was adjourned to the 28th. On the 28th the only person who objected to the terms was the 2nd plaintiff and the Judge finding that one of the plaintiffs objected held that he could not sanction the compromise although the other parties consented. He proceeded with the suit. The 2nd plaintiff's Vakil said he had no instruction to go on and the 2nd plaintiff did not examine any witnesses or proceed with the suit. The learned Judge upon the findings on record held that there was no ground for framing a scheme for these temples and he dismissed both the suits with costs.

Two grounds are taken in appeal. The first is that on the materials before the Court a scheme ought to have been framed and the second is that the Judge ought to have adjourned the case for the purpose of the 2nd plaintiff calling further evidence. As regards the adjournment we think that on the facts of this case the learned Subordinate Judge was right in refusing to adjourn the case any further. The parties ought to have been ready on the 25th with all their evidence; the case was one filed more than a year before the trial was taken up and the mere fact that a compromise was suggested and a short adjournment was asked for is no ground for not going on with the case if the compromise fell through. We cannot say that the Judge ought to have further adjourned the case to enable the parties to call their evidence. It is alleged that the Pleader for the 2nd plaintiff declined to proceed with the suit. No reason is, however, given as to why he declined to go on with the suit and there was no reason why if he refused, the plaintiff should not go on with any evidence he had, when the Judge refused to grant adjournment. The Vakil filed no affidavit. On this part of the case the question is, whether, having regard to the circumstances of this case, the Judge ought to have further adjourned a part heard case which was going on and which was only interrupted because the parties said they wanted to compromise. I do not think the facts in the affidavits show that there was any good ground for any further adjournment.

Turning to the merits, there is no ground shown for any scheme being framed. There is no mismanagement by the archakas which appears in the evidence. The evidence shows that the yield was about half a putti per acre. The archakas had not only to maintain themselves out of the income but they had to see that the puja of the temple was properly performed and the naivedyams and offerings to the God presented daily. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the archakas are misappropriating the income and not performing the services of the temple. So far as the temple is concerned, it appears from the Income Register that the archakas have always been in possession of the lands and utilising the rents and profits for the services of the temple and for the archaka services which they performed. The Inam Service Register Ex. A, is dated 24th August, 1860. The statement of the then archaka is Ex. B. It is dated 1859 and shows that even in 1859 the archakas were in possession. There was no trustee of the temple and the lands were given for the performance of the puja and observing the daily offerings of food and light and other rites which have been going on in the same way and also for sivarathiri, navarathiri and sankaranthi festivals. There is nothing to show that the puja has not been performed by the archakas or that any reason exists for a scheme being framed for the purpose of taking the lands out of the possession of the archakas and vesting it in trustees. No malversation is proved and the record does not show that the archakas set up any title in themselves to deal with the property as their private property. Even in the lease-deeds which are filed they have described the property as devadayam property. As regards the 3 acres which are not covered by the main grant, they set up a title of their own, but, prima facie properties outside the inam grant would be private properties unless it is shown that they have been acquired with the help of the funds of the temple which is not the case that is proved now before us. The question shortly is, is there any necessity for any scheme? Has there been any mismanagement or misappropriation of the properties and would it be in the interests of the temple to have an elaborate scheme vesting the property in trustees? On the evidence the Subordinate Judge thought that there was no necessity for a scheme and we agree with him. Should the archakas in future do anything to the detriment of the temple or if they fail in their duty, it will be time for a proper suit being filed and a scheme being asked. We do not think the mere fact that a suit is filed for a scheme on an ex parte sanction by the Advocate-General is by itself a ground for a scheme being framed.

The appeals fail and are dismissed with costs.

The three miscellaneous petitions are also dismissed.

Limitation Act (IX of 1903), Sch. I, Arts. 120, 126—Alienation by Hindu father—Possession not given to alienee—Suit to set aside alienation—Limitation.

Article 126 of Sch. I of the Limitation Act is not applicable to a suit by a Hindu to set aside his father's alienation of ancestral property where the alienee never gets possession of the property under the alienation. In such a case the right of the son amounts merely to obtaining a declaration that the deed is invalid and the suit will be governed by Art. 120.

Mr. A. P. Panday, for the Appellants.

Mr. Uma Shankar Bajpai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs for a declaration that a certain mortgage-deed, executed on 22nd May, 1915; by their father, defendant No. 1, in favour of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 is invalid on the ground that their father executed the deed without legal necessity and that the property being an occupancy holding could not be transferred under the provisions of the Tenancy Act. Amongst other pleas the defendants took up the plea that the suit was barred by limitation. The trial Court applied Art. 126, Limitation Act, and found that the suit was maintainable as it was brought within 12 years of the date of the alienation impugned. In first appeal the District Judge held that Art. 126, Limitation Act, was not applicable inasmuch as the plaintiffs were not asking for possession but only for a declaration. It has been explained to us that the plaintiffs could not ask for possession, inasmuch as, even if the deed in suit be set aside, the defendants are in possession under previous mortgages.

The sole point argued before us in this appeal is that the lower Appellate Court was wrong in refusing to apply Art. 126. It is argued that Art. 126 will apply even though the father's alienee does not get possession of the mortgaged property in cases where the interest actually mortgaged was not capable of physical possession. We are unable to accept this proposition. It is sufficient, in our opinion, to refer to the decision of Murajalli Hunia Goundan v. Ramaswami Chetti (1). Article 126 is doubtless based upon the principle that a son's knowledge of alienation by his father ordinarily arises when he sees the alienee in possession. In cases where the alienee never gets possession, no limitation can arise under s. 126. In such cases the right of the son will amount merely to obtaining a declaration that the deed is invalid. The limitation prescribed for such a suit is s. 120, namely, six years. In this case six years having elapsed from the date of the alienation impugned, the suit was rightly held by the lower Appellate Court to be time-barred. For these reasons we dismiss this appeal with costs.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL, REPRESENTED BY THE COLLECTOR OF NELLORE—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Madras Irrigation Cess Act (VII of 1865), s. 1, proviso—'Engagement', meaning of—Grant of inam by Government—Increased cultivation, without use of more water—Government, whether entitled to levy water cess.

The general principles underlying the Privy Council decision in the Utlam case (1) are applicable also to the case of inams, and so long as more water is not taken by an inamdar than he was taking land at the time of the grant, he cannot be charged any water-cess for cultivating more land with the same amount of water, unless the Government proves that the right of cultivation is limited as alleged by it in any particular case. [p. 384, col. 2.]

Engagements arising out of the Inam Settlements are engagements contemplated by the proviso to s. 1 of the Madras Irrigation Cess Act, 1865, just like the Permanent Settlement sanads. [ibid]

In case of grants of inams at least by the Government, the effect of the Inam Settlement is to vest the channels with their head sluices and branch and subsidiary channels, and the tanks or reservoirs, in the inamdar through whose inams the same respectively pass or in which they are situate. [p. 384, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Ramesam, J.—Where a certain easement is granted there are two ways of increasing cultivation without enlarging the easement. One is by a more economical use of water. The second method is by improving the capacity of the tank and by converting water which might have otherwise overflowed. [p. 380, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Nellore, dated the 14th March, 1923, in A.S. No. 232 of 1922, preferred against that of the Court of the Additional District Munsif, Nellore, dated the 10th September, 1921, in O.S. No. 1 of 1921.

Mr. S. Varadachariar, for the Appellant.

The Government Pleader, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

Ramesam, J.—This second appeal arises out of a suit for a declaration that the defendant is not entitled to collect any water-rate, road-cess or other cesses in respect of any of the plaintiffs' lands in the village of Bhuj-Bhuj, Nellore Taluk, irrigated under Lingala Cheruvu and Patha Cheruvu.

The defendant, the Secretary of State for India in Council, is entitled to impose water-cess under Act VII of 1855 (the Madras Irrigation Cess Act) when certain conditions are fulfilled, but road-cess is levied by the District Board under the Local Boards Act of 1920 and not by the Secretary of State for India in Council. So far as the suit relates to the road-cess, the suit does not lie and must be dismissed except as to any increment in the road-cess consequent on the imposition of water-cess. But the second appeal was argued only in respect of water-cess.

The District Munsif gave a decree. On appeal the District Judge reversed the District Munsif's decision and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. The plaintiffs have filed this second appeal.

The history of the village seems to be somewhat as follows: The village was granted originally as a personal grant burdened with jodi and afterwards at about the time of the Permanent Settlement the jodi itself was remitted by Mr. Travers and the inam converted into a charitable inam; in the Inam Settlement of 1862, the inam was dealt with as a dharmadayam inam which was to be held free of quit-rent so long as a choultry called the Kumundan (vernacular corruption of Commandant) choultry situated on the road to Madras is maintained properly. In the Government Order dated 1st September, 1913, (Ex. IV) there are a number of papers which show its earlier history. The facts above set forth by me appear from the Collector's letter and it was then supposed that the assessment alone constituted the inam. These particulars also appear from the inam statement, a translation of which also appears in the same papers and show the date of the second grant by Mr. Travers to be 24th August, 1803. There is an Inam Register, which bears endorsements dated 1861 and 1864, appearing as an enclosure in the same Government order from which it appears that the total extent of the village entered was 523.04 acres. Its assessment was put down as Rs. 400. This apparently has not been made from actual calculation but is a rough estimate at a round figure. Column 10 shows that it should be held so long as the repairs are performed and the choultry is maintained. Column 11 shows that it was granted by Mr. Travers in 1803. This was in 1861. Sometime after, a portion was taken up for the trunk road and so a reduction was made. After the necessary reductions were made, the area of the village appears to have been 518.85 acres and the assessment Rs. 380-15-5. This was in 1864. Of the total area 94.49 acres appear as wet. The title deeds are not forthcoming. But as the lands changed hands, it appears that the appellants are not responsible for the non-production of the title-deeds. This is immaterial.

The contents of the inam title-deed correspond to the contents of the register and we may presume that the figures in the Inam Register also appeared in the title deed. The learned Government Pleader's contention is that the inamdar is not entitled to irrigate, free of water-cess, any excess beyond the 54.49 acres mentioned in the register. The Government order above referred to, namely, Ex. IV, says that the present extent of the village is 685.56 acres, and as it is not contended by the other party that the boundaries of the village have changed, the discrepancy between the old measurement of 1864 and the measurement of 1913 must be attributed to the use of an inaccurate unit and rough methods of survey in 1861. In the absence of any light thrown on the matter, it must be assumed that the inaccuracy has effected every part of the village uniformly. This is the principle adopted by their Lordships Benson and Miller, J.J., in A. S. Nos. 182, 183 and 184 of 1904 (vide judgment dated 1st May, 1908). On this supposition the 94.49 acres mentioned in the Inam Register would correspond to $\frac{94.49 \times 685.56}{518.85}$ or 124.85 acres

now. The descriptive memoir, Ex. I, shows 120 acres as wet. But even then the plaintiffs are irrigating more lands as wet lands. Exhibits VIII-a and IX-a show that for Faslis 1323 and 1324 the extent of wet land under Patha Cheruvu was 140.69 and 141.09 acres respectively. The question, therefore, still arises whether the excess beyond 124.85 acres (or beyond 94.49 if the method of proportionate increase is not adopted) is entitled to free irrigation. In appeal before the District Judge the Government gave up their contention with respect to the lands under Lingala Cheruvu and the second appeal has been argued only with reference to the lands under the Patha Cheruvu.

Now the contention of the Government Pleader is as I have already stated that the inamdar is entitled to irrigate free of water-cess only to the extent stated in the Inam Register or title-deed. In the first place, in some obvious directions this argument seems to be a little too much. For instance, there is no information available as to how much of the extent mentioned in the Inam Register was under Patha Cheruvu and how much under Lingala Cheruvu. Only the total is mentioned as 94.49 acres whether we take the old correct extent to be 125.84 acres or 94.49, there is an increase of wet cultivation in the village. In fact the total wet area in 1913 is shown as 224.48 acres though so much was not actually cultivated in 1913 and 1914. The increase must have been in respect of the lands under Lingala Cheruvu. This means that though there is an increase of cultivation and there are now more wet lands under Lingala

Cheruvu, the Government do not seek to impose water-cess in respect of these lands and the extent of wet lands as entered in the Inam Register is immaterial. This shows that the extent mentioned in the register or the deed is really not entitled to that extreme significance which is sought to be attached to it by the Government Pleader. His contention is that the inam lands must be distinguished from zemindari lands and that the principles laid down by the Privy Council in the Utlam case [Kandukuri Balaswamy Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India] (1) are not applicable to inams. Zemindari lands were permanently settled in 1802 under Regulation XXV of 1802, the Government reserving only the peishcush and inams were settled under the Inam Settlement in 1860 to 1864 and the claim of the Government over all the inams in the Presidency was fixed (known as quit-rent). Their Lordships of the Privy Council in the Utlam case (1) dealt also with inams. Though the inams in that case were inams within a zemindari they say that the inamdar can rely on the same engagement to the same extent as could a tenant of zemindari land authorised by the zemindar to use the water. There is no zemindari within which the suit inam is situated. Here the engagement was directly with the inamdar. In the matter of considering the effect of the engagement the same principles ought prima facie to apply to the engagements implied in the Inam Settlement as to the engagements implied in the Permanent Settlement. In every case we have merely to estimate the effect or the grant of easement and nothing turns upon either the time of the grant or the particular tenure under which the lands are held by the land-holder. It is said by the Government Pleader that in India the Government have by common law the right of assessing every parcel of land to Government revenue [vide Boddupalli Jagannadham v. Secretary of State for India (2)] and that when they exercised that right in 1862 by imposing certain amount of quit-rent on a certain area of wet land, they did not exercise their right over the remaining lands on the footing of wet land and if the inamdar has since been converting them into wet lands, imposition of water-cess is the only means of re-adjusting the rights of Government. But exactly the same argument will apply to zemindari lands. It may be that in 1802 only a certain area was irrigated as wet. Merely because the extent of wet land has increased the Government is not entitled to increase the peishcush or impose fresh water-rates so long as the easement granted has not been exceeded. A zemindar is entitled to make full use of the easement for the development of his zemindari. The possibility of improving cultivation of lands was, of course, considered at the time of the settlement. The policy was to encourage such improvement. See Urlam case, Kandukurri Balasurya Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India (1). The same considerations apply to inams. In the case of inams also quit-rent was fixed for them and was not intended to be altered. The Inam Settlement was as much a great Act of State as the Permanent Settlement and was so described by the Privy Council in Secretary of State for India v. Maharaja of Bobbili (3). To say that the inamdars cannot irrigate more than the extent of land mentioned in the register free of water-cess is really inconsistent with the concessions made by the Government in respect of the excess lands under Lingala Cheruvu. Apart from this, let us look at the facts of this particular case. The tank, Patha Cheruvu, in the suit village seems to have its main supply from a hill stream known as Udumalavagu which rises in Government land and until it comes to the suit land passes through Government land and, therefore, can be regarded as a Government source of irrigation. At a particular place it bifurcates and one of the branches goes to the suit village and is not intended for any other village. The District Judge in appeal finds that possibly the capacity of the tank must have been increased, otherwise a larger extent of land could not have been brought under cultivation. We are bound to accept this in second appeal as a finding of fact. But it is not suggested, nor has it been found, that the width of the branch leading to the suit village from the point of bifurcation was increased or that any changes were made at the point of bifurcation so as to draw more water in this branch than before. So long as nothing has been done to increase the measure of the easement at the point of bifurcation, it seems to me that any improvement in the capacity of the tank is really immaterial. If the tank holds more water by its bunds being raised, now, it only means that water which would have flowed through the branch channel intended for the suit village, but which might have overflowed the tank because the bunds were not high enough to hold it, is now kept in the tank, and not that more water is drawn through the branch channel. So long as the easement is not enlarged, even if more water is conserved, it seems to me that the Government is not entitled to impose water-cess. The hill stream, the branch channel and the tank in this case correspond to the Vamsadhara river in the Urlam case (1). In the language of the Privy Council, "The Government could not complain if the amount of water taken were within this limit." Where a certain easement is granted there are two ways of increasing cultivation without enlarging the easement. One is by a more economical use of water. This was recognised in Secretary of State for India v. Swami Nautheswarar (4) and also in the Secretary of State for India v. Ambalavana Pandarasannidhi (5). The latter decision was confirmed by the Privy Council in Ambalavana Pandara Sannadhi v. Secretary of State for India (6) following the Urlam decision in Kandukurri Balasurya Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India (1). The second method is by improving the capacity of the tank and by converting water which might have otherwise overflowed. It is possible that this has happened in this case on the Judge's finding of fact. But as I have already observed this does not involve an extension of the easement and so long as the easement itself has not been enlarged, that is, so long as the water which might have flowed through the branch channel is not increased, apart from such variations as may be due to larger rainfall in one year and smaller rainfall in another year, the extension of irrigated lands does not justify the Government imposing water-cess. The learned Government Pleader relied on the decision in Chidambara Rao v. Secretary of State for India (7) which is cited also by the District Judge. In that decision at page 69* there is a remark: "It was the duty of the Inam Commissioner to ascertain and record in the title-deed, not the extent of the land which was actually under wet cultivation at the time of the Inam Settlement, but only [the extent to which the inamdar was entitled to supply of water free of charge." I do not know on what materials this sentence was based. With great deference to the eminent Judge who made this statement, I doubt if there is anything in the nature of the inam enquiry which justifies it. It was the duty of the Inam Commissioner to ascertain the assessment so that the quit-rent to the Government may be fixed, and for the purpose of ascertaining the assessment it may be necessary to enquire how much was wet and how much dry, and as to the wet lands irrigated with water from a Government source of irrigation, how much was cultivated with such water free of charge; but where the entry is very general, i. e., so much land wet and so much dry, I doubt if it had anything to do with the question of irrigation free of charge. Anyhow, the observations must be confined to the facts of the particular case. In that case it was a small inam situated in a village which was being irrigated by the Kistna anicut water and any increase of irrigation by an inamdar must necessarily deprive some other ryotwari holders or other inamdars of their accustomed supply of water and in that way enlarge the easement. In that case there can be no possible suggestion of increase in the extent of irrigated land not being followed by an increase in the easement. It was not the case of a tank which was the sole source of irrigation for one whole village or a branch channel irrigating one village. The water in the Kistna and Godavari anicuts is distributed to several villages through a system of channels under the control of the Government, and where any land-holder uses more water than was allotted to him by the Government he must necessarily trespass upon the rights of some other inamdar or land-holder. There being no possibility in that case of the easement solely granted for the inam being enlarged within the limits within which he could irrigate his lands to a larger or smaller extent as he likes, the observations of the learned Judges were justified on the facts. Anyhow we must consider that case, if it is intended to lay down anything, in the light of the decision in the Urlam case (1). I am unable to distinguish the second appeal before me, on principle, from the decision of the Privy Council. Following it I allow the appeal, reverse the decision of the District Judge and restore that of the District Munsif with costs here and in the lower Appellate Court.

Madhavan Nair, J.—The plaintiffs are the appellants. They are the inamdars of a whole inam village called Bhuj-Bhuj in Nellore Taluk. "This is followed by the statement....." The present income is less as the extent of the present wet cultivation is less.....The extent will be entered in the title-deed." The Survey Register shows large extent of wet waste land, which though wet was not actually cultivated at the time of the Settlement. The lands of this village were cultivated by the inamdars with water taken from a tank called Patha Cheruvu. The Tank Memoirs show an ayacut of 120 acres under this tank. Patha Cheruvu is fed by a stream flowing through the Government forest in Nellore Amancherla. The entire bed of the tank belongs to the Government, but its bund belongs to the inamdars. In Fasli 1323 the extent of wet cultivation carried on by the inamdars with water taken from the Government tank was 146 acres 96 cents, and in Fasli 1324, 141 acres 9 cents. This extent of wet cultivation being in excess over the extent mentioned as wet land in the Inam Register, viz., 96 acres 58 cents, the Government attempted to levy on the inamdars water-rate for cultivating this extra area. This second appeal arises out of a suit instituted by the plaintiffs for a declaration that the defendant, i. e., the Government is not entitled to levy water-cess on the lands irrigated under Patha Oheruvu and for an injunction restraining the defendant from collecting water-rate for Faslis 1323 and 1324 and for subsequent Faslis. The contention of the defendant is that the plaintiffs are entitled to free irrigation only to the extent of 96 acres 58 cents. noted in the Inam Register and that for cultivating any land in excess of this area with water taken from the tank they are bound to pay water-rate.

On the main contention raised in the pleadings, the District Munsif found that the supply channel and the Patha Oheruvu tank, the sources of irrigation for this village, belong to Government, that the plaintiffs did not divert any water to the supply channel from the adjoining channel as was contended for by the defendant, that the capacity of the tank had not been in any way increased by the plaintiffs, that there was no evidence that more water was being taken by the plaintiffs from the tank and that the increased extent of cultivation was due to the thrifty use of water made by the plaintiffs. It was conceded in the course of arguments that the plaintiffs had somewhat raised the height of the bund of the tank, which they had a right to do as the bund belonged to them, and that probably due to the silted condition of a connected channel supplying water to the adjoining Nellore tank more water was flowing into the stream supplying Patha Oheruvu. It was also found by the District Munsif on the evidence of D. W. No. 1, the Tahsildar of Nellore, that "the water from Patha Oheruvu irrigates only the lands in Bhuj-Bhuj, Nellore, and is intended only for these lands." The learned District Judge agreed with the District Munsif in all his findings except the one regarding the capacity of the tank. On this he found that its capacity had increased and that now more water was stored in it. Even making allowance for the economic use of water and the improvement in the plug of the sluice which prevented wastage, the District Judge was of opinion that without increasing the capacity of the tank the large extent of land in question could not have been brought under cultivation. But it may be mentioned—and this fact has not been disputed—that the plaintiffs have not interfered in any way either with the supply channel or with the tank except by increasing the height of its bund by a few feet.

In the circumstances found by him, the District Munsif held that the principle of the Urlam decision in Kandukuri Balasurya Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India (1) applied to the facts of this case and that the Government is not, therefore, entitled to levy water-rate for the excess area cultivated by the plaintiffs. The District Judge held that the decision in the Urlam case [Kandukuri Balasurya Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India] (1) is inapplicable and that this case is governed by the decisions in Chidambara Rao v. Secretary of State for India (7) and Secretary of State for India v. Perarulala Ramanuja Jeer Swamigal (8) following which he upheld the contentions of the Government.

The question for our consideration is whether, in the circumstances found by the lower Court, the Government is entitled to levy water-rate for the excess area of land (viz., the area over and above 96 acres 58 cents.) cultivated by the plaintiffs with water taken from the Patha Oheruvu. I may state at once that, in my opinion, the finding of the District Judge that the storage of the tank had increased does not in any way affect the decision of this question, in view of the admitted fact already mentioned that the plaintiffs have not in any way interfered with the supply channel of the tank and, what is most important of all, the fact that there is no evidence to show that more water is now being taken by the plaintiffs for irrigation.

In support of its right to levy water-rate, the Government relies upon s. 1 of Act VII of 1865. Under this section, whenever water is supplied or used for purposes of irrigation from any river, stream or channel belonging to or constructed by the Government, the Government is entitled to levy a separate cess for such water, provided the zemindar or the inamdar whose land is so irrigated, is not entitled, by virtue of engagements with the Government, to irrigation free of separate charge. In order to justify the cess under this Act, it must be made out that the irrigation was caused by water supplied or obtained from a river or stream belonging to the Government. In this case the concurrent finding of the lower Courts show that Patha Cheruvu and the stream belong to the Government and, therefore, the water for irrigation is supplied from a Government source. Under the Act, exceptions from the levy can be claimed if the claimants can show engagements with the Government under which they are entitled to irrigation free of separate charge. The law is well-settled that Permanent Settlement sanads and engagements arising out of Inam Settlements are engagements contemplated by Act VII of 1865. As regards the precise extent to which the zemindars and inamdars were entitled to claim exemption under the cover of these engagements, viz., as to whether the right of free irrigation extended only to the extents specified in these engagements and to nothing more, there has been for a long time acute difference of opinion among the learned Judges of this Court. In Secretary of State for India v. Perumal Pillai (9) it was held that where there is no limitation in the grant itself, the proprietor is not entitled to an unlimited water supply. In Chidambara Rao v. Secretary of State for India (7) it was held that an inamdar is not entitled to cultivate free of charge land which is in excess of what was under cultivation at the time of the grant. In Kandukuri v. Secretary of State for India (10), which was subsequently reversed by the Privy Council in Urlam case [Kandukuri Balasurya Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India] (1), it was held that the only engagement which can be inferred from the Permanent Settlement is that the peishcush being fixed with reference to the area of the land then under cultivation no further charge for the use of water should be made in respect of that area and that if any extent of land in excess of that area is cultivated by the aid of Government water, water-rate could be levied in respect of that excess extent. In Secretary of State for India v. Kannepalli Janakiramayya (11), Sankaran Nair, J., in an elaborate judgment dealing with the history of the permanent and Inam Settlements and the policy underlying such, controverted this view differing from Miller, J. In Letters Patent Appeal against his judgment reported as Secretary of State for India v. Kannepalli Janaki- ramayya (12), Oldfield and Bakewell, J.J., (Sadasiva Aiyar, J., dissenting) upheld the views of Miller, J., and accepted the decision in Kandukuri v. Secretary of State for India (10). The latter decision was again followed by Sir Arnold White, C. J., and Ayling, J., in Secretary of State for India v. Ambalavana Pandarasannidhi (5), but this was subsequently reversed by the Privy Council in Ambalavana Pandara Sannadhi v. Secretary of State for India (6) following Urlam case [Kandukuri Balasurya Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India] (1). In this state of the law the Privy Council in the Urlam case [Kandukuri Balasurya Prasadha Row v. Secretary of State for India] (1), set aside the decision of this Court in Secretary of State for India v. Ambalavana Pandarasannidhi (5). Stated shortly, in that case the main question was as regards the extent of the right of the Urlam zemindar to cultivate the lands of his zemindari with water taken from the Vamsadhara river which was lying contiguous to it. Their Lordships of the Privy Council pointed out that the Permanent Settlement was an engagement with the Government within the meaning of the proviso to s. 1 of Act VII of 1865, that the effect of the settlement was to vest the channels, with their head sluices and branch and subsidiary channels, and the tanks or reservoirs in the zemindaris, through or within whose zemindaris the same respectively passed or were situate, and to give the zemindar the right of easement of taking water from the river for irrigation purposes. The following passages in their Lordships' judgment describe the measure of this right at page 904*.

"Assuming that the Vamsadhara river belongs to Government, the case may be looked on in this way. The owner of a river and of contiguous land through which passes a channel constructed for irrigation purposes and supplied with water from the river, grants the contiguous land together with the channel. Obviously some right or easement of taking water from the river must pass. The only question is as to the measure of this right. In their Lordships' opinion, the right must be measured by the physical conditions, such as the size of the channel, or the nature and extent of the sluices and weirs governing the amount of water which enters the channel, and not by the purposes for which the grantor or his tenants have been accustomed to use water from the channel prior to the date of the grant. The water in the channels may never have been used by the grantor or his tenants at all, but it would be absurd to hold on that account that no easement or right of taking water from the river passed by the grant. The case would have been very different if the contiguous land had been granted reserving the channel." Later on occurs the following passage at page 907*:

"There being no evidence whatever that more water is being taken from the river than would be justified by the sanads—construed as in their Lordships' opinion they ought to be construed, it follows that the appellants must succeed in respect of the jirayati lands on which the cesses in dispute were levied."

In the result, their Lordships declared that the rights of the zemindar of Urlam under the Urlam sanad to irrigate the Urlam estate from the channels in question and their branches are not limited by any mamool and that the zemindar should not be charged water-cess for the extra cultivation that he carried on with the amount of water he was justified in taking from the river under the sanad.

In view of the findings in this case that the source of irrigation belongs to the Government and that there is no evidence to show that more water is being taken from the Government tank than would be justified under the Inam Settlement, it is argued by Mr. Varadachariar that the principle of the Urlam decision (1) would apply to this case as well, and that, therefore, the Government is not justified in levying any water cess. It appears to me that this contention is well-founded; but it is urged by the learned Government Pleader that the decision in the Urlam case (1) is inapplicable to this case, as here we are dealing with the rights of an inamdar as against the Government and not with the rights of a zemindar, and further that that decision is based upon a construction of the permanent sanad in that particular case. These observations, no doubt, are true, but I cannot see how these affect the application of the general principle underlying the Urlam decision (1). The judgment of the Privy Council is not based upon any special or distinctive feature of the Urlam zemindari sanad. Their Lordships point out that the effect of the Permanent Settlement is to vest the channels, with their head sluices and branch and subsidiary channels, and the tanks or reservoirs in the zemindaris through or within whose zemindaris the same respectively pass or are situate. And then they say, as will appear from the extract that I have already quoted, that, when such a grant or settlement is made, some right or easement of taking water from the river must pass and that right is measured by the physical conditions, such as the size of the channel, or the nature and extent of the sluices and weirs governing the amount of water which enters the channel. So long as the measure of this easement has not been enlarged by the grantee in any way the Government cannot complain. This is the general principle underlying that decision. Inams are Government grants subject to quit-rents, and in some instances to services. The inam in the present case is said to be an ancient one and it was only simply confirmed in the names of the ancestors of the present owners at the time of the Inam Settlement. There is, therefore, no question of a new contract at the time of the settlement between the Government and the inamdar. It is admitted that engagements arising out of the Inam Settlements are engagements contemplated by Act VII of 1865 just like the Permanent Settlement sanads. The inam title-deed has not been produced, but that does not in my view make it difficult to apply the principle of the Urlam decision (1) to this case. To use language similar to that employed by the Judicial Committee, when the owner of a tank and of contiguous land, in which are situated the sluices and channels for irrigation through which water passes, grants this contiguous land together with the sluices, etc., some right or easement of taking water from the tank must pass. It is obvious that such a grant involving such an easement must have been made when this inam was granted. Otherwise, seeing that the tank is reserved for the Government, it would be impossible for the inamdar to cultivate the land granted to him in inam. If this inference arising from the grant is not justified, it will be for the Government to disprove it by producing the title-deed to show the limitations of the inam grant. That has not been done in this case. It follows, therefore, that, so long as more water is not taken by the inamdar than he was taking from the tank at the time of the grant, he cannot be charged any water-cess for cultivating more land with the same amount of water. Though the liability of the inamdars to be charged with water-cess under Act VII of 1865 for extended cultivation arose in the Privy Council case, their Lordships did not specifically deal with the question as it was thought for the special reason that the inams in that case were inams within the zemindari. Still their Lordships remark that, if the cess were levied upon her (appellant) as inamdar, she can rely on the same engagement to the same extent as could a tenant of zemindari land authorised by the zemindar to use the water.

With regard to the rights of free irrigation depending upon the implied undertaking between the Government and the grantee of the land, an inamdar, a mittadar and a zemindar have all been treated alike by this Court. See Secretary of State for India v. Ambalavana Pandarasannidhi (5). In support of this statement three cases were cited: Chidambara Rao v. Secretary of State for India (7), Lutchmee Doss v. Secretary of State for India (13), Secretary of State for India v. Perumal Pillai (9) and the Urlam case (10). When the respondent's Vakil sought to distinguish these cases on the ground that the first two relate to inam villages and the last to a zemindari formed from haveli lands, while the suit mitta was carved out of an ancient zemindari, the learned Judges stated:

"But it is difficult to see why the same principle should not be followed, the implied undertaking being based on precisely the same principle in the case of zemindaris and inams."

This case, as already observed, was ultimately reversed by the Privy Council on the authority of its decision in the Urlam case (1). But these remarks of the learned Judges of this Court are interesting in that they show that they were prepared to treat a zemindar and an inamdar alike with respect to the right claimed regarding free irrigation. Their view as regards the measure and extent of that right was not accepted by the Privy Council. In my opinion, the engagements implied in the Permanent Settlements and the Inam Settlements with respect to the matter under consideration should be interpreted in the same manner and in the light of the same principle. Unless the Government proves that the right of cultivation is limited as alleged by it in any particular case by producing the title-deed, I think the general principles underlying the Urlam decision (1) should be applied to the case of an inam as well (at any rate, to the case of a major inamdar), and that an inamdar is not liable to be charged water-cess unless he takes more water from the Government tank. Innes, J., rightly states the principle to be applied to cases like the present thus:

"Where a channel has been constructed by Government acting as the agent of the community to increase the well-being of the country by extending the benefit of irrigation and in pursuance of that purpose a flow of water is directed to the villages designed to be benefited, it becomes simply a question upon the circumstances of the case whether there has not been a conveyance to such villages in perpetuity of a right to the unobstructed flow of water by the channel. Looking at the permanency of such works and to the permanency attaching to the object, that there was a transfer in perpetuity would seem an almost necessary conclusion, unless there were other circumstances to lead to one of an opposite character. It might, of course, be capable of being shown that the privilege was granted as a mere license and that before the water was allowed to flow to the villages, it had been left open to Government by arrangements then made to obstruct the flow at will at any future period." [See Ponnusami Tevar v. Collector of Madura (14)].

The decision in Chidambara Rao v. Secretary of State for India (7), no doubt, supports the respondent. One of the reasons mentioned as the basis of that judgment is this:

"It was the duty of the Inam Commissioner to ascertain and record in the title-deed, not the extent of land which was actually under wet cultivation at the time of the Inam Settlement, but only the extent to which the inamdar was entitled to supply of water free of charge....."

We have not been referred to any authority justifying this statement. On the other hand, it has been understood that the duties of an Inam Commissioner consisted in ascertaining the necessary existing facts with regard to cultivation, etc., for the purpose of enabling the Government to fix a proper quit-rent while granting an inam. In this connection, the remarks of Sankaran Nair, J., regarding the construction of inam deeds and the interpretation of the entries therein in his judgment in Secretary of State for India v. Kannepalli Janakiramayya (11) may well be referred to with advantage. As those remarks are apposite in the present context I quote them [here, Though his judgment was set aside in Letters Patent Appeal, it is interesting to note that their Lordships of the Privy Council in the Urlam case (1) arrived at the same conclusions as he did in Secretary of State for India v. Kannepalli Janakiramayya (11) regarding the Government's right to levy water-cess for extended cultivation in semindari lands. The remarks are as follows:

"Moreover, there is nothing in the title-deeds or proceedings to show that the inamdar is only entitled to cultivate with channel water those lands entered as 'wet free of charge and that even those lands are entitled to exemption only for the first crop. Neither in the despatch from the Government of Madras to the Secretary of State, Revenue, dated 9th August, 1859, with the enclosures thereto, giving full information of the intended proceedings to enfranchise inams, nor in the final report of Mr. Blair on the operations of the commission, dated 30th October, 1869, the proceedings of the Madras Government and the despatch of the Secretary of State thereon, dated 10th August, 1871, nor in the mass of records relating to the enfranchisement of inams, is there any indication that it was the intention of the Government to advance any claim on account of any excess cultivation or that the inamdar's right was confined to the wet area mentioned in the title-deeds. If it was so, the Government could very easily prove it without asking the Courts to upset a practice upon theories. The available records support the contrary conclusion: when water was supplied from Government anicut works, no cess was levied on the mamool wet presumed to have been under wet cultivation at the time of the Permanent Settlement or the enfranchisement of the inams, but cess was levied on water taken for the irrigation of the rest. That the claim was so restricted to water from Government works is not without significance. The copies of the inam title-deeds show that the inam is only 'claimed to be of acres of dry land and acres of wet land'. All information had to be given in the registers as the assessment was fixed at the discretion of Government; no inference can be drawn, therefore, that any fact therein mentioned was the basis of any contract. In asking the Government to cancel their order that inams limited to a limited number of lives should not be interfered with, the Inam Commissioner said: 'It is superfluous to add that in all such settlements every care is taken that the interests of Government do not suffer. A fair addition is made to the present value of the village on account of the prospective improvement from the cultivation of waste lands.'"

Perhaps it is possible to distinguish Chidambara Rao v. Secretary of State for India (7) by noting the special facts that it is a case of a small inam, that possibly the source of irrigation in that case was common to many inamdar and ryotwari holders of lands and that increased cultivation by one inamdar meant necessarily enlargement of the easement enjoyed by him to the detriment of the other inamdars. But in view of the Privy Council decision in Urlam Case, [Kundukuri Balasurya Prasada Row v. Secretary of State for India] (1), I am inclined to think that the correctness of the decision in Chidambara Rao v. Secretary of State for India (7) is open to question. The same may be said about the decision in Secretary of State for India v. Perarulala Ramanuja Jeer Swamigal (8) also. That decision is not of much use as it does not contain any discussion of the question under consideration. The decision in Secretary of State for India v. Srinivasa Chariar (15) relates to the question whether the full right to the quarries and minerals in a village granted as shrotriem inam passed to the grantee and the decision depended upon the true construction of that grant. It does not lay down any principle useful for the decision of this case.

The amount of quit-rent to be paid by an inamdar being once for all fixed at the time of the Inam Settlement, it follows as in the case peishcush that the Government cannot by levying water-cess increase that amount. In these circumstances, applying the decision of the Privy Council to this case I would hold that the Government is not entitled to charge water cess for the increased extent of land cultivated in their inam village by the appellants in Faslis 1323 and 1324. I would, therefore, set aside the decree of the District Judge and restore that of the District Munsif with regard to the plaintiff's suit for a declaration and injunction as regards Patha Cheruvu with costs here and in the lower Appellate Court; but as the Government is the defendant it is not necessary—as it is not usual—to include in the decree the relief by way of injunction.

Railway Company—Reserved Accommodation—Company agreeing to make endeavours to provide reserved carriage—Issue of necessary tickets—Contract, whether complete—Failure to supply carriage—Passengers' right to damages.

The plaintiffs applied to a Railway Administration for a reserved carriage. The Officiating Traffic Manager replied that endeavours will be made to supply the carriage and issued orders to his subordinates that a reserved carriage should be supplied. The necessary tickets were also issued to the plaintiffs by the booking clerk. No reserved carriage was available when the train arrived and the plaintiffs instituted a suit for damages against the Railway Company:

Held, that there was no complete agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant Company inasmuch as the Company had merely stated that endeavours would be made to provide such a carriage, that the fact that the necessary tickets were issued did not amount to a completion of the contract, and that the plaintiffs were not, therefore, entitled to damages. [p. 388, col. 2.]

First appeal from a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Gorakhpur.

Dr. K. N. Katju, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Peary Lal Banerji, Narmadeshwar Prasad Upadhiya, A. P. Pandey and Rudra Narain Srivastava, for the Respondents, JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the Bengal and North Western Railway Company arising out of a suit brought for damages by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' case was that they had come to Deoria Station to celebrate the marriage of a relation and for their return journey required a reserved third class bogie for the marriage party from Deoria to Cawnpore. The Railway Company agreed to supply the reserved accommodation required provided it was engaged from Bhatni. They then went on to allege that as the arrangement of reserved accommodation was necessary the plaintiffs agreed to pay the additional charge from Bhatni to Deoria, and it was finally settled between the plaintiffs and the defendant that a third class bogie would be attached to 1 Up Passenger train from Bhatni. In accordance with this alleged arrangement the plaintiffs sent their servant to Bhatni to purchase 92 third class tickets and asked the station staff to attach the reserved carriage to the train. It is suggested that the station staff were not honest because they wanted some illegal gratification, which was not paid, and that owing to their wilful neglect they omitted to attach the bogie carriage to the train by which the plaintiffs' party was to go to Cawnpore. The result was that when the train arrived there was no reserved carriage available at Deoria and the plaintiffs' party was put to considerable inconvenience, annoyance and disappointment. They claimed Rs. 5,000 as damages, and Rs. 17-4-0 the excess amount of fare realised from them for the journey from Bhatni to Deoria.

The defendant Company denied that there was any complete contract between the parties under which the Company was bound to provide reserved accommodation. They also denied that there was any dishonesty on the part of their servants and pleaded that owing to a mistake, the carriage which was intended to be reserved, had been returned to Gorakhpur by an earlier train.

The learned Subordinate Judge on the question of fact came to the conclusion that there was no mistake committed and that a bogie carriage was available at Bhatni, but was not attached to the train by which the plaintiffs' pairakar returned. He did not believe the defendants' story that the carriage had been sent on by mistake earlier in the day. On the question of completeness of the agreement he was of opinion that, although the Railway did not make a definite promise to provide reserved accommodation but only promised to make an endeavour to supply the required bogie carriage, nevertheless the plaintiffs' agent did go to Bhatni to purchase the tickets, and 92 were sold to him on the understanding that reserved accommodation would be available. In his opinion, therefore, the contract was complete as soon as the tickets were issued.

Before us there has been much controversy as to whether the carriage was available at Bhatni and had been dishonestly kept back or whether it had been previously despatched by mistake. The papers relating to Bhatni Station do show that the carriage had been despatched by an earlier train. The evidence of the station staff at Bhatni is also to the same effect. No papers of the Gorakhpur Station showing that the carriage had been returned by an earlier train were produced by the Company and it is contended before us that such papers have since been destroyed. As, however, we think that the suit must fail on the ground that no complete undertaking to provide a reserved carriage had been given, it is not necessary for us to go into the question whether the finding of the Court below that there was dishonesty practised by the station staff at Bhatni, is or is not correct. The plaintiffs' case in the plaint was that the contract was complete long before their agent went to Bhatni. This has not been accepted by the Court below and is contradicted by the purport of the reply sent by the Railway Company to the plaintiffs' application. On the 5th of July, 1922, the plaintiffs had applied for a reserved carriage from Deoria to Cawnpore. The Officiating Traffic Manager replied to this letter saying that he regretted that a reserved carriage could not be provided by the train from Tahsil Deoria but that endeavours were being made to provide one from Bhatni to Cawnpore by the same train. In pursuance of this suggestion he no doubt issued orders to the subordinate staff that a reserved carriage should be supplied. A carriage intended to be reserved subsequently was undoubtedly despatched from Gorakhpur to Bhatni but no reserved carriage was available when the train arrived at Deoria. There is no doubt that the plaintiffs were put to considerable inconvenience, annoyance and disappointment, and there is also no doubt that the failure to provide reserved accommodation was not due to any disinclination on the part of the Assistant Traffic Manager to provide one, but to the carelessness, to say the least, of the staff at Bhatni.

At the same time it cannot be disputed that the Officiating Traffic Manager never agreed to provide the reserved carriage unconditionally. He never guaranteed that any such carriage would be available but promised that endeavours would be made to provide one. This reply, in our opinion, successfully establishes the fact that there was no complete agreement between the plaintiffs and the Railway Company for providing a reserved carriage. The mere fact that necessary tickets were issued by the booking clerk at Bhatni does not amount to a completion of any fresh contract. As pointed out above, it was not even the plaintiffs' case that the contract was completed as soon as the tickets were sold to the plaintiffs' agent.

The plaintiffs' party travelled from Deoria to Cawnpore. The Company, therefore, had no right to charge for the fares from Bhatni to Deoria. They, however, offered to refund Rs. 17-4, the excess fare charged for journey between Bhatni and Deoria.

We are, therefore, of opinion that in view of there being no complete contract, the claim for damages cannot be allowed. The plaintiffs, however, are entitled to recover Rs. 17-4 which they paid as excess fare to the Company. It is also clear that the whole trouble has arisen owing to the gross neglect of the station staff at Bhatni, and that the plaintiffs have undoubtedly been put to considerable inconvenience. We accordingly allow this appeal and modifying the decree of the Court below dismiss the plaintiffs' claim for damages, but uphold the decree for Rs. 17-4, the excess fare. In view of the circumstances stated above we direct that the parties should bear their own costs in both Courts.

Co-sharer—Partition—Settlement granted by former co-owner, how far binding on co-sharer to whom property is allotted.

A person to whom a parcel of land has been allotted by a decree for partition does not take it subject to a settlement made by his former co-sharers without his concurrence when the land was the joint property of all the co-sharers.

Nrisingha Ranjan Mukherjee v. Soudamini Dasi (1), followed.

Appeal from a decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Shahabad, dated the 16th August, 1924, reversing that of the Munsif, Arrah, dated the 28th July, 1923.

Mr. B. Prasad Sinha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

Das, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are the appellants before us, sued for recovery of khas possession of two plots of land which were recorded in the Record of Rights under two khewats. Plot No. 1410 is in khewat No. 3/1 which was the khās khewat of the defendants second party. Plot No. 1395 was recorded in khewat No. 3/6 which was the khewat of the defendants first party and the defendants second party jointly.

The case of the plaintiffs is that they took a settlement of the disputed lands from the defendants second party and that they are entitled to recover possession thereof. It is not disputed that at the date of the settlement in question the estate was under partition and that the disputed lands have now been allotted to the takhta of the defendants first party who contest the suit.

The learned Judge in the Court below has found that there was a private arrangement between the defendants first party and the defendants second party under which the former were in possession of the joint bakashat lands and the latter were in possession of the joint raiyati lands.

The learned Advocate for the appellants contends that the defendants second party being in possession of these lands were entitled to settle the same with them. I am unable to agree with this contention. It is well settled that a co-sharer has no right to deal with joint property in such a way as to affect the rights of the other co-sharers. The case of waste lands stands on a different footing altogether; but so far as tenancy lands are concerned, a co-sharer cannot prejudice the interest of the other co-sharers. As I have pointed out the disputed lands have fallen to the takhta of the defendants first party and I can see no ground whatever for holding that the defendants first party would have this encumbrance on their property. The case rests on a principle and is covered by authorities. It is not necessary to refer to all the authorities; it will be sufficient for us to refer to a decision of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Nrisingha Ranjan Mukherjee v. Soudamini Dasi (1) where it was pointed out that a person to whom a parcel of land has been allotted by a decree for partition of a Civil Court does not take it subject to a permanent lease granted by his former co-owners without his concurrence when the land was the joint property of all the co-sharers.

This appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Wort, J.—I agree.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 92—Suit for possession by trustee against trespasser—Sanction, whether necessary—Hindu Law—Religious endowment—Temple—Founder's right to appoint shebait.

Section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code has reference to those cases, and those cases alone, where there is an allegation of breach of any express or constructive trust created for public or charitable purposes, or where the direction of the trust is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust. It has no application to suits where the plaintiff claims possession of an endowed property on the allegation that he is the duly appointed trustee and that the defendant is a trespasser. [p. 390, col. 2.]

Inayat Husain v. Faiz Muhammad (1), Muhammad Abdul Majid Khan v. Ahmad Saeed Khan (2), Puttu Lal v. Daya Nand (3) and Nilkanth Devrao v. Ramkrishna Vithal (4), relied on.

In the case of a temple, in the absence of a provision in the deed of endowment prescribing the mode of devolution to the office of shebait and in the absence of a custom to the contrary, the power to appoint a successor to a shebait reverts to the heirs of the founder of the trust and a shebait has no right to appoint a successor to himself. [p. 391, col. 1.]

Second appeal from a decree of the Additional District Judge, Bareilly, reversing that of the Additional Subordinate Judge.

Mr. Uma Shanker Bajpai, for the Appellants.

Dr. K. N. Katju, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a defendants' appeal and arises out of a suit for possession of certain property that was dedicated to a certain deity by one Pandit Manni Ram by a deed of endowment, dated the 10th of January, 1899. By that deed Manni Ram appointed himself and one Gulab Shankar as sarbarakars of the endowed property. Manni Ram died in or about the year 1900 and Gulab Shankar alone continued to act as sarbarakar of the endowed property.

By a deed, styled as a deed of gift, dated the 17th of December, 1912, Gulab Shankar appointed the defendant-appellant as trustee and manager in his place. About three months prior to the institution of the suit giving rise to the present appeal Gulab Shankar died, Udho Ram, the heir of Manni Ram, on the 15th of December, 1922, executed a document in favour of the plaintiff by which he appointed the plaintiff as trustee and sarbarakar of the endowed property.

The plaintiff's case was that Gulab Shankar had no right to nominate a successor of his own, or to appoint a trustee of the endowed property, and that, notwithstanding the execution of the deed of gift of 1912, Gulab Shankar continued to act as sarbarakar till the date of his death and that after Gulab Shankar's death the right to appoint a sarbarakar and trustee of the endowed property vested in the heirs of the founder of the trust. The plaintiff maintained that the defendant was in possession of the endowed property as a trespasser and accordingly claimed the relief referred to above.

The suit was contested by the defendant on various grounds, but as only two points have been argued in the present appeal, we need not notice the points other than those argued before us. It was contended by the defendant that the suit was barred by s. 92 of the Civil Procedure Code and that Gulab Shankar was competent to appoint the defendant as a sarbarakar and trustee and that the defendant-appellant was rightfully in possession of the endowed property.

Both the Courts below overruled the plea based on s. 92, Civil Procedure Code. The trial Court accepted the other contention advanced on behalf of the defendant mentioned above and accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The lower Appellate Court came to the conclusion that the defendant Gulab Shankar had no right in preference to the heirs of the founder of the trust to appoint a successor of his own and that the defendant had not been validly appointed and the plaintiff was a duly appointed trustee and was entitled to the relief sought.

In our judgment the decision of the lower Appellate Court is perfectly correct and ought to be affirmed. It is well settled that s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, has no application to suits where a plaintiff claims possession of the endowed property on the allegation that he is the duly appointed trustee and that the defendant is a trespasser. vide Inayat Husain v. Faiz Muhammad (1) and Muhammad Abdul Majid Khan v. Ahmad Saeed Khan (2). It has also been decided by this Court in the case of Puttu Lal v. Daya Nand (3) that s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, does not apply to a suit between persons who individually claim a right to succeed to the office of trustee. In view of these authorities it is impossible to hold that the present suit was a suit of the nature contemplated by s. 92, Civil Procedure Code. It is to be noted that s. 92 has reference to those cases, and to those cases alone, where there is an allegation of breach of any express or constructive trust created for public purposes of charitable or religious nature, or where the direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust. In the present case there was no allegation of any breach of the trust nor was it alleged that the direction of the Court was necessary for the administration of the trust and in the absence of any such allegation s. 92, Civil Procedure Code, could not apply. The view that we take is in consonance with the view taken in the case of Nilkanth Devrao v. Ramkrishna Vithal (4). We accordingly agree with the Courts below in holding that s. 92 was not a bar to the suit.

In our judgment there is no substance either in the second point argued by the learned Counsel for the appellant. We are in the present case dealing with a temple as distinguished from a math. In the case of a temple the endowed properties are deemed vested in the presiding god treated as a juristic person, the management being vested in a trustee. The manager or trustee of a temple is designated as a shebait.

"The devolution of the office of shebait depends primarily on the terms of the deed by which the trust is created. In the absence of any provision in the deed as to the devolution of the office of shebait the title to the property or to the management and control of the dedicated property, as the case may be, follows the line of inheritance from the founder, in other words, it passes to his heirs unless there has been some usage or course of dealing which points to a different mode of devolution, e. g., devolution on a single heir;" vide, Mulla's Principles of Hindu Law, 5th Edition, page 408 of the cases cited therein. As already stated, in the absence of a provision in the deed prescribing the mode of devolution to the office of shebait and in the absence of a custom to the contrary, the power to appoint a successor to a shebait reverts to the heirs of the founder of the trust and a shebait has no right to appoint a successor to himself, vide the cases of Chandra Nath Chakrabarti v. Jadabendra Chakrabarti (5), Sheo Prasad v. Aya Ram (6) and Sheoratan Kunwari v. Ram Pargash (7). In the present case it has been held by both the Courts below that Udho Ram is the heir of Manni Ram, the founder of the trust. Therefore, the appointment of the plaintiff by Udho Ram as a shebait is a valid appointment and the plaintiff has a right to enter into possession of the endowed property as a trustee. The defendant has not a shadow of title to remain in possession and the decree passed against him is perfectly correct. The remaining grounds taken in the memorandum of appeal have not been pressed. Accordingly we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Under Art. 182 of Sch. JUDGMENT.—The legal representative of the first judgment-debtor deceased is the appellant in this civil miscellaneous second appeal. Two contentions were raised on his behalf in the Court below. One was an objection based on some ground of res judicata. That has not been argued here. The second ground is one of limitation. It has been contended by the learned Vakil for the appellant that the third execution petition made on the 29th June, 1923, about two years and more after the death of the first judgment-debtor did not apply for execution against the legal re presentative of that deceased judgment-debtor and cannot, therefore, be regarded as an execution application in accordance with law within the meaning of cl. (5) of Art. 182 of the Limitation Act. At one stage I understood the learned Vakil for the appellant to contend that the uncontradicted allegation on his part was that the execution-creditor-petitioner knew of the death of the first judgment debtor and that in spite of such knowledge he made the application against the deceased person without claiming execution against his legal representative as he would have done. But I found no such allegation in the affidavit filed by his client in the Court of first instance. It is, therefore, difficult to see how an execution application filed by the decree-holder in such circumstances can be held not to be in accordance with law. My attention has been drawn to the decision in the case of Madho Prasad v. Kesho Prasad (1). In that case the learned Judges, who had before them the case of a money decree and an attachment that was set aside by the Executing Court on a claim petition made by a stranger, held that a series of subsequent execution applications without claiming relief against the judgment-debtor's legal representative could not save limitation. But if I understand the learned Judges in that case correctly, they seem to think that if there had been a subsisting attachment at the time of the application or an order for sale the matter might be different. Here, however, it is not the case of a mere money decree. The relief granted was relief in the first instance by sale of the property and may be of the interest of the judgment-debtor in the property. The raison d'être, therefore, of that decision would not apply to the present case because the learned Judges have in their very judgment pointed out a distinction which would really cover the present case. But I do not think for my purpose it is really necessary to rely upon that case at all because it is admitted before me by the learned Vakil for the appellant, that even though in the execution petition of the 29th June, 1923, the legal representative of the first judgment-debtor was not shown, still the execution application was against the other judgment-debtor under the decree, and under the Explanation in Art. 182 when there is a joint decree against several judgment-debtors an application for execution against any one of them has the effect of saving the running of time even as against the other judgment-debtors. I have not been satisfied by the learned Vakil for the appellant that the application for execution of the 29th June, 1923 was not in accordance with the law or that otherwise the application now in question is barred by the law of limitation.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Messrs. Ali Zaheer and Mahabir Prasad Srivastava, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Lucknow, dated the 17th January, 1927, setting aside a decree of a Munsif in Lucknow, dated the 22nd September, 1926.

The facts of the case, so far as it is necessary to state them for the purpose of disposing of this appeal, are as follows:—

Sheikh Muhammad Ali (defendant No. 1) had obtained two decrees for costs against

(1) 19 A. 337; A. W. N. (1897) 75; 9 Ind. Dec. (N. s.) 221.

Dayal (defendant No. 2), father of Jhao Lal (plaintiff No. 1) and grandfather of Babu Lal (plaintiff No. 2). The decrees were passed under the following circumstances:—In September, 1910, Dayal sold to Sheikh Muhammad Ali, a 4-annas share in village Chaurasi out of the 7-annas share in the possession of Musammāt Menda and Musammāt Dhānu. Sheikh Muhammad Ali was to sue jointly with Dayal for the recovery of the entire 7-annas share and was to defray expenses of the litigation. They brought the suit and eventually the claim was decreed by the Court. In 1916 Dayal sued Sheikh Muhammad Ali for possession of a $7\frac{1}{2}$ pies share which the latter had got under a compromise filed in the former suit. Dayal's suit against Sheikh Muhammad Ali was based on the allegation that the sale-deed executed by him in favour of Sheikh Muhammad Ali was void, as it was without consideration and an unconscionable transaction. Sheikh Muhammad Ali also brought a suit against Dayal for possession of a 3-annas $4\frac{1}{2}$ pies share on the ground that he was entitled to a 4 annas share under the terms of the sale-deed executed by Dayal, but had obtained possession over a $7\frac{1}{2}$ pies share only. Dayal's suit was dismissed, but Sheikh Muhammad Ali's suit was decreed by the Court. Costs were awarded to Sheikh Muhammad Ali against Dayal in both the suits. Sheikh Muhammad Ali took out execution of the decree for costs and attached an 8-annas zẽmindari share to realize the decretal amount (Rs. 454-4-0). Jhao Lal, son of Dayal and Babu Lal, grandson of Dayal, then brought the present suit for a declaration that the said zẽmindari share is not liable to attachment and sale in execution of the decrees for costs obtained by Sheikh Muhammad Ali against Dayal. The suit was dismissed by the first Court, but decreed by the lower Appellate Court on plaintiffs' appeal.

Sheikh Muhammad Ali has now come to this Court in second appeal.

It appears that Dayal died after the appeal was heard by the learned Subordinate Judge. The learned Subordinate Judge has decreed the appeal holding that Dayal's conduct in both the suits mentioned above in which costs were decreed against him was 'like that of a dishonest man.'

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that Dayal's conduct could not be said to be immoral and it was the duty of the son and the grandson of Dayal, under the Hindu Law, to pay off the debts of Dayal which were not tainted with immorality.

In our opinion there is no substance in this appeal.

The appellant's learned Counsel has referred to the following cases:—

Shambhu Bhan Singh v. Chandra Shekhar Bakhsh (1), Mata Din v. Mahraj Din (2), Ramkrishna Trimbak v. Narayan Shivrao Aras (3), Sumer Singh v. Liladhar (4), Chakouri Mahton v. Ganga Proshad (5), Kirpal Singh v. Balwant Singh (6) and Venugopal Naidu v. Ramanadhan Chetty (7).

It was held in Shambhu Bhan Singh v. Chandra Shekhar Bakhsh (1) that under the Hindu Law a decree for mesne profits passed against the father alone as the result of a litigation in which he unsuccessfully defends his position to the family estate can be executed against the joint family property. It is hardly possible to characterize such conduct of the father as immoral or illegal.

It was held in Mata Din v. Mahraj Din (2) that the liability imposed by the Court upon the father to indemnify the person, with whose property he had improperly interfered, creates a debt which may justly be recovered from the ancestral property in the hands of the son.

It was held in Ramkrishna Trimbak v. Narayan Shivrao Aras (3) that sons cannot escape liability for payment of the debts of their father contracted in a trade carried on by him in contravention of Government Servants' Conduct Rules on the ground that the conduct of their father in contracting debts in such trade was "avyavahar."

It was held in Sumer Singh v. Liladhar (4) that under the Hindu Law money borrowed by the father to defend a suit for defamation is a debt for which a Hindu son and grandson are liable.

It was held in Chakouri Mahton v. Ganga Proshad (5) that a decree obtained by a person for damages on account of injury done to his crops, by the obstruction of a channel through which he was entitled to irrigate his lands, against one B, who was governed by the Mitakshara School of Hindu Law, could be executed on his death against his son where it could not be said that the decree obtained was due to an act of the judgment-debtor, which was a wanton interference with the rights of the decree-holder, and that the liability imposed thereby on the judgment-debtor was an illegal or immoral debt.

In Kirpal Singh v. Balwant Singh (6) the ruling in Devi Ditta v. Saudagar Singh (8) that a "just debt" means "a debt which is actually due, and is not immoral, illegal or opposed to public policy, and has not been contracted as an act of reckless extravagance or of wanton waste, or with the intention of destroying the interests of the reversioner", was approved of by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee.

It was held in Venugopal Naidu v. Ramanadhan Chetty (7) that the liability of a Hindu father, who as a member of a devastanam committee, unauthorisedly spends the devastanam funds for expenses of a litigation, and is afterwards directed by the Court to pay the costs out of his own private funds, constitutes a debt which his sons and grandsons are under a pious obligation to discharge. The expression 'avyavaharika' debt means a debt which is not supportable as valid by legal arguments, and on which no right could be established by the creditor in a Court of Justice. The following observations were made by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in his judgment in that case:—

"I am inclined to adopt Colebrook's paraphrase, namely, 'debt incurred for a cause repugnant to good morals' as more nearly approaching the true import of the expression than any of the meanings given by the other authorities. If I might venture upon giving my own translation of the expression 'avyavaharika' I would paraphrase an 'avyavaharika debt' as a debt which is not supportable as valid by legal arguments and on which no right could be established in the creditor's favour in a Court of Justice . . . As regards the case in Ramiengar v. Secretary of State for India (9) also relied on strongly by the appellant's learned Vakil, that decision rested 'on its own special circumstances', for, the learned Judges found in that case that the father knowingly brought a false case as a pauper. When he lost the suit and was made liable for the Government costs, it was held that his sons were not liable to Government for such costs so incurred. Without saying that I agree with the reasons given in the said decision, that decision is easily distinguishable from the present case. The judgment in Alagiri-sami Naicker v. Subbayyar (10) does not establish that the committee members (three of whom joined in the appeal to the High Court with the concurrence of the remaining two) dishonestly preferred the appeal to the High Court which appeal costs they were directed to bear out of their private funds. Imprudent and even 'unconscientiously' imprudent debts of the father are not in my opinion, immoral, illegal or 'avyavaharika debts."

In the case of Darbar v. Khachar (11) a Hindu father erected a dam which obstructed the passage of water to the property of his neighbour. The Court found that the father had no right in law to erect the dam and a decree was passed against the father for damages. It was held by Knight, J., that the sons were not liable for the amount of the decree as such a debt is 'avyavaharika', i. e., a debt which a father ought not "as a decent and respectable man" to have incurred. A Hindu son is answerable for the debts legitimately incurred by his father, not for those attributable to his (father's) failings, follies or caprices. This interpretation of the word 'avyavaharika' appears to be too narrow, for it excludes debts for which the sons might be held legitimately liable and the view taken in this case has been dissented from by the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Allahabad [see Chakouri Mahton v. Ganga Proshad (5), Venugopal Naidu v. Ramanadhan Chetty (7) and Sumer Singh v. Laladhar (4).]

It appears that the learned Sanskrit scholars have differed as to the meaning of the expression 'avyavaharika debt'. We are inclined to adopt Colebrooke's paraphrase, namely, a debt incurred for a cause repugnant to good morals.

Cases Nos. 1 to 6 referred to by the learned Counsel for the appellant are not in point, so far as the decision of the point under consideration is concerned. We have carefully considered the 7th case—Venugopal Naidu v. Ramanadhan Chetty (7), referred to by the appellant's learned Counsel, and the case of Ramiengar v. Secretary of State for India (9) referred to by the respondents' learned Counsel. In Ramiengar's case (9) a Hindu father brought a suit in forma pauperis as next friend of one of his sons to establish his adoption and the suit was dismissed on the ground that the adoption set up was false. The father was ordered accordingly to pay the costs due to Government under s. 440, Civil Procedure Code of 1882. The question arose as to whether the sons were liable to pay such costs. It was held that the liability to pay the costs was imposed as a penalty for the father's misconduct in bringing a suit which he must have known to be false, that such liability might be regarded as in the nature of a fine and that the debt incurred by the father being thus tainted with immorality, his sons were not bound to pay it.

In our opinion Ramiengar's case (9) was rightly decided. We agree with the decision and the reasons for the decision in that case.

We agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that the grounds on which Dayal based his claim against Sheikh Mohammad Ali and also the grounds on which he resisted the suit brought against him by Sheikh Mohammad Ali were false and dishonest. He had knowingly brought a false case against Sheikh Mohammad Ali and had knowingly on false grounds defended the suit which Sheikh Mohammad Ali had brought against him. We hold, agreeing with the learned Subordinate Judge, that the plaintiffs are not liable to pay the costs for which the decrees in question were passed against Dayal.

The result is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed. We dismiss the appeal with costs. The decree of the lower Appellate Court is confirmed in all respects.

(DEAD) AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIV, r. 6—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182 (5)—Compromise decree in mortgage suit—Composite decree—Final decree; whether necessary—Application for final decree, whether step-in-aid of execution.

A compromise decree in a mortgage suit provided that the mortgaged properties may be sold if the decree amount was not paid within a certain time and that, if the proceeds of the sale were insufficient, the judgment-debtor was to be personally liable to pay the balance to the decree-holder. After obtaining this decree, thinking that a final decree was necessary in the case, the decree-holder applied on three occasions, for obtaining a final decree. On each of these occasions, his application was dismissed. He then applied for execution of the original decree:

Held, (1) that the decree was a composite one and though it was irregular and was not strictly warranted by the provisions of O. XXXIV of the Civil Procedure Code it was executable; [p. 396, col. 1.]

(2) that the decree in question being a compromise decree and the parties having agreed that the decretal amount should be realised in a particular way, the Court had full jurisdiction to carry out the intentions of the parties whatever was the nature of the decree; [ibid.]

Abir Paramanik v. Jahar Mahmud Mandal (1) and Sital Singh v. Baijnath Prasad (2), relied on.

(3) that though an application for final decree is not an application for execution, yet the three prior applications were steps-in-aid of execution inasmuch as the plaintiff was asking the Court to make an order which was thought necessary, before taking out actual execution of the decree and the ultimate object of the petitions was to hasten the actual realisation of the decree amount. [p. 396, col. 2.]

Appeal against an order of the District Court, North Malabar, in A. S. No. 441 of 1923, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Payyoli (in R. E. P. No. 761 of 1922, in O. S. No. 748 of 1914).

Mr. K. P. Ramakrishna Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The mortgagee decree-holder is the appellant. This civil miscellaneous second appeal arises out of an application filed by him to execute the decree which he obtained in a suit for sale of the mortgaged properties. The decree sought to be executed is a compromise decree. It provides for the sale of the properties if the decree amount is not paid within a certain time. It also provides that, if the proceeds of the sale are insufficient, the judgment-debtor is to be personally liable to pay the balance to the decree-holder. After obtaining this decree, thinking that a final decree was necessary in this case, the appellant applied on three occasions for obtaining a final decree. On each of these occasions, his application was dismissed. Then he made an application under O. XXI, r. 11 of the Civil Procedure Code for the execution of the original decree.

The respondent contended that the decree being only a preliminary decree, there could be no execution till a final decree has been obtained and that the application was barred by limitation. The learned District Munsif overruled both these contentions. On appeal the learned District Judge upheld the contentions and dismissed the appellant's petition for execution.

The same contentions against the execution of the decree are urged before us by the judgment-debtor respondent. As regards the first contention, we are of opinion that it is not necessary to get a final decree in this case. The 1st and the 2nd paragraphs of the decree comply with the requirements of the usual preliminary and the final decrees in a mortgage decree for sale, and the third paragraph distinctly makes provisions for the usual personal decree. The decree is a composite one; and though it is irregular and is not strictly warranted by the provisions of O. XXXIV of the Civil Procedure Code, it cannot be said to be inexecutable on that account. Further, even if it is held that there is no final decree, the decree in question being a compromise decree and the parties having agreed that the decretal amount should be realised in a particular way, the Court has full jurisdiction to carry out the intentions of the parties. That this can be done has been held in Abir Paramanik v. Jahar Mahmud Mandal (1). The fact that it was a decision under s. 89 of the old Transfer of Property Act does not affect the principle enunciated in it. See also the observation of the learned Judges in Sital Singh

v. Baignath Prasad (2) that strictly speaking O. XXXIV, r. 5 has no application to a compromise decree. On both these grounds we think it was not necessary for the appellant to obtain a final decree in the circumstances of this case.

The respondent's next contention is that the suit is barred by limitation. If the three applications for the final decree can be considered to be steps-in-aid of execution, then, it is admitted that the execution is not barred. It is first urged that there is no executable decree at all in this case and, therefore, there can be no application which may be called a step-in-aid of execution. To this, the reply is, as we have already held, that in this case there is an executable decree and, that being a compromise decree the parties are entitled to agree as to how the decree amount should be realised. The next argument is that an application for a final decree is not an application for execution. This is no doubt true, but the question is whether the applications in question, though styled applications for final decree can, with reference to their contents be considered to be "steps-in-aid" of execution. The decree-holder by applying for a final decree was endeavouring to get an order which he thought at the time as necessary before executing his decree. Afterwards due to better advice he gave up that attempt and applied for execution of the decree without getting a final decree as that was necessary. This was what has happened in this case. In these circumstances, we fail to see why the Court should not consider that the prior three applications were steps-in-aid of execution, for, as we have already said, the plaintiff was asking the Court to make an order which was thought necessary, before taking out actual execution of the decree. As the ultimate object of these petitions was to hasten the actual realisation of the decree amount, we are satisfied that they were "steps-in-aid" of execution. In this view the execution application which has given rise to this civil miscellaneous second appeal is not barred by limitation.

We set aside the decree of the District Judge and restore that of the District Munsif with costs here and the Court below.

NAGPUR JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

CIVIL REFERENCE No. 31 OF 1927.

September 6, 1927.

Present :—Mr. Kotval, A. J. C.

MOHAMMAD HAMID—APPELLANT

versus

MUNICIPAL COMMITTEE, DRUG—

RESPONDENT.

C. P. Municipalities Act (II of 1922), s. 83 (2)—Haisiyat-tax—Assessment—Matters to be considered—Exclusion of income-tax, insurance premia and house rent.

The question of liability mentioned in s. 83 (2) of the C. P. Municipalities Act is not the question of the amount fixed in respect of the liability but of a person's liability to pay the tax at all. [p. 397, col. 2.]

According to the rules of Drug Municipality in assessing a person to haisiyat tax, his relative tax paying capacity, i.e., the circumstances, social position and the size of his family, must be considered. [ibid.]

Income-tax paid by an assessee must be wholly excluded from his gross income. Exclusions on account of insurance premia and house-rent are matters within the discretion of the Committee in the first instance or in appeal by the Deputy Commissioner or other officer entitled to hear it under law, to be decided on the facts of each case. [p. 398, col. 1.]

Reference made by the Deputy Commissioner, Drug, dated the 20th January, 1927.

Mr. D. T. Mangalmurti, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—Mr. Muhammad Hamid, Tahsildar, was assessed by the Municipal Committee of Drug to haisiyat-tax for the year 1926-27 on Rs. 3,300, his gross salary for that year. He appealed to the Deputy Commissioner claiming that the amounts paid by him as income-tax, house-rent and life insurance premia should have been deducted from his gross salary and the tax levied on the balance Rs. 2,469-12-0 "which he is capable of spending at Drug proper."

The Deputy Commissioner was of the opinion that deduction on account of income-tax should be allowed but not on account of house-rent. He was doubtful whether provident fund payments and insurance premia should be deducted, though he was inclined to think that they should be to the extent permitted by income-tax rules. He has referred the case to this Court under s. 83 (2) of the C. P. Municipalities Act, 1922, as he considered that a question of liability to and the principle of assessment of the tax was involved.

The points referred are whether in assessing the appellant to the haisiyat-tax the Municipal Committee should have made allowance for house-rent, income tax and insurance premia paid by him and for the contributions made by him to the provident fund. No question as to contributions to the provident fund arises in this case for the record discloses no claim made by the appellant in respect of them. He alleged that he paid Rs 86 4 0 for income-tax, Rs. 240 for house-rent and Rs. 54 for life insurance and claimed a deduction in respect of these items only. The reference in respect of provident fund contributions is made apparently because in answer to the notice issued to the Municipal Committee it alleged that in respect of Government servants the gross annual salary was the basis of assessment, no deduction being allowed on account of house-rent, income-tax, provident fund and insurance premia. As the point as to provident fund contributions did not arise in the appeal, it must be excluded from the reference which, in my opinion, must be confined to such questions as arise in the particular case in which it is made.

In this Court the Municipal Committee has been represented by an Advocate but no appearance has been made by or on behalf of the appellant.

In my opinion, no question of liability to the tax within the meaning of s. 83 (2) arises in this case for that is admitted. The question of liability mentioned in s. 83 (2) is not the question of the amount fixed in respect of the liability but of a person's liability to pay the tax at all. Mr. Hamid's liability to pay the tax is not denied. He only contests the amount which the Municipal Committee requires him to pay.

As regards the question of the principles of assessment, the Municipal Committee has overlooked the rules framed by it and sanctioned by Government by Notification No. 190-617-S-18, dated the 31st July, 1919. Rule 5 (b) of these rules lays down the principles of assessment applicable to the present case. According to that rule the relative tax paying capacity, i. e., the circumstances, social position and the size of the family of each person liable to be taxed must be considered. The measure of the tax-paying capacity of a Government servant, who, we assume, like Mr. Hamid, has no other income or property in the Municipality, does not depend solely upon the amount fixed as his salary. The tax is intended to be elastic and contemplates a greater nicety of adjustment to the means of the payer than is usually possible in the matter of taxation. The possibility of Government servants earning the same salary and having no other income or property paying different amounts as haisiyat-tax is within the contemplation of the rule. The difference in the amount may be due to difference in the circumstances, social position or the size of the family.
